"I stayed over the summer and trained with everyone, so I think that helped," Ramos said. "I was very excited for this meet. I'm having fun, and I have Liliani as a motivator."

The Jayhawks have dominated the dual since the teams started running it two years ago. However, K-State took three of the top five places in the women's race and two of the top five spots in the men's race this year.

Reigning Big 12 champion Colby Wissel placed first for KU on the men's side.

K-State's top two runners in the men's race were juniors Alex Umberger (15:47) and Danny Schneider (15:56), who placed first at last week's J.K. Gold Classic.

"I think the men will be fine if they keep competing this way," coach Michael Smith said. "I think we ran average on the men's side, but I was happy with the top two. I think they did what they could do."

Umberger, who placed 64th last year at the Midwest Regional Championships, also competes with the indoor and outdoor track teams.

Umberger said running against the reigning Big 12 Champion was a daunting task, but he did what he could.

"When you're racing against him, you're racing for second," he said. "I think I waited too long to make a move for second. Next week, when we go to Nebraska, I'm excited because it'll be the first real test."

The Wildcats will compete against at the University of Nebraska Invitational in Lincoln, Neb., next weekend.

VOLLEYBALL

Fritz encouraged by Varney's Invitational

By Jonathan Potter
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

As the No. 22 K-State volleyball team rolled over Northern Iowa 3-0 in the Varney's Kansas State Invitational, coach Suzie Fritz said she saw a glimpse of the best K-State team she has ever coached.

"From start to finish in the Northern Iowa match, we were playing as well as we have played all season," Fritz said. "I told the team that there were times in that match that that's the best Kansas State team I've ever been affiliated with."

Though Fritz was most pleased with the Northern Iowa match, she said her team played with good rhythm throughout the tournament.

The Wildcats won all nine games they played against Fresno State, Northern Iowa and Arkansas.

With K-State leading big against Fresno State, Fritz rested starters Rita Liliom and Nataly Korobkova for much of the match. Freshman outside hitter Julianne Chisholm came off the bench to record seven kills on a team-high 19 attacks.

"It's good to get on the floor," Chisholm said. "You get the reps in practice, but it's so different once you get into the match and have to think about all the different things you need to do. It's really helpful to get into games like this."

Chisholm, a freshman from Hillsboro, Kan., has tallied 18 kills in 12 games this season. "She had a tremendous preseason and is still learning," Fritz said. "She certainly has earned some opportunities. We'll need her down the road."

With the preseason now completed, the Wildcats (8-2) have the same record as they did heading into conference play a year ago. Unfortunately for K-State, the 2006 Big 12 Conference season was a struggle, as the Wildcats finished 4-16 in league play.

"I think that we are where we need to be right now," Fritz said. "We are pleased with what we got out of the preseason. We learned an immense amount about our team."

K-State will begin Big 12 action Wednesday on the road against Kansas (7-3).

Julianne Chisholm spikes the ball over a Fresno State opponent during K-State's final match in the Varney's Kansas State Invitational. The defeat of Fresno State earned the Wildcats the tournament title on Saturday. The next volleyball match is 7 p.m. Wednesday in Lawrence.

the information they found that has led them to the conclusion that the stabilizing that was planned for the lakeside of the dam is no longer necessary," said Bruce Snead, city commissioner. "They have concluded what measure to use that would be most effective."

The project will include stabilization through the process of modifying the sand foundation under the dam and excavating trenches approximately 65 feet deep in order to construct concrete walls to support the dam, said Bill Empson, Tuttle Creek Dam project manager.

"We anticipate construction completion in 2010, which is about two years ahead of our original schedule," Empson said. "Another thing that this project includes is that we are starting to work to modify the spillway." Empson estimates that the entire project will require 50 to 60 contractors for the two-year period.

According to the Army Corps of Engineers Web site, at a meeting held by the Special Committee on Energy, Natural Resources and Environment in 2001, a Corps attendee explained the likelihood of an earthquake in the Wamego area within the next 100 years and the effects it would have. The attendee described that the dam would crumble and water would spill through the cracks, causing the dam to drain in approximately six days.

"The 5.7 (magnitude) probability is a three percent chance within the next 50 years," McNulty said. "The problem with earthquake frequency is that each year you do not have that kind of earthquake, the probability goes up."

Another option addressed at the 2001 meeting examined the possibilities of removing the dam. After further examination, however, the committee decided that removal was not an option. Removing the dam would result in the jeopardization of drinking water for 1.5 million Kansas residents.

"The dam serves many objectives," Strawn said. "It provides sub control on the Missouri River, so if Missouri is in a flood stage they cut off water at the dam; it serves recreation; it keeps Manhattan from flooding every year. To drain that or take that dam down, in my view, that would not be wise at all."

Currently, the dam is set up with an emergency system that will alert the area with sirens in case of malfunctions. Though prior arrangements were being made to remove the system once construction is completed, the city has requested control of the sirens to serve as a tornado warning system once the project is finished.

The process of stabilizing the dam will include modifying the sand under the foundation and 65-foot-deep trenches to build concrete walls for additional support.

"We installed a dam failure system so that if we were to have an earthquake and the dam were damaged, we could evacuate people," Empson said. "Even after we're done, that system will provide tornado siren coverage for people who did not have it before."

Over the next few years, the stabilization project will continue. The project aims to create a dam that will be secure during an earthquake situation.

of security incidents and civilian deaths in Iraq is on the decline and the number of Iraqi forces standing up to fight has and the overall number of security incidents in the last two weeks was at its lowest levels since June 2006.

"As a bottom line up front, the military objectives of the surge are in large measure being met," Petraeus said. "Iraqi elements have been standing and fighting and sustaining tough losses, and they have been taking the lead in operations in many areas."

Lawmakers shared mixed responses to the testimony.

House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., said in a statement, "Today, despite overwhelming evidence that neither goal has been achieved, Gen. Petraeus testified that the surge would last at least until next summer. This is simply unacceptable."

Rep. Nancy Boyda said she will reserve judgement until she fully understands the new proposal.

"I think his testimony was very straightforward," said Boyda, D-Kan. "He made it clear that this is about Iraq. I certainly don't think he's trying to be a mouthpiece of the administration."

Boyda said she thinks Petraeus is a dedicated military officer who would not yet comment on specific points.

"I'm going to look at the specific recommendations, but that could take a few days to really start to flush out," she said.

Other Democratic lawmakers were not as impartial. Rep. Tom Lantos, D-Calif., chair of the House Foreign Affairs Committee, advocated his position at the hearing.

"The fact remains that the administration has sent you here today to convince the members of these committees and the Congress that victory is at hand," Lantos said. "With all respect to you, I don't buy it."

our team because he brought a whole new dynamic to our defense."

Prince did not release the nature of the injury, but it appeared the injury happened when Trafalis landed awkwardly on Moore's knee.

Prince also said injured cornerbacks Ray Cheatham and Bryan Baldwin will be game-time decisions.

NOT OVERLOOKING ANYONE

This weekend's opponent, Missouri State, is from the Gateway conference in the NCAA Football Championship Subdivision, formerly known as Division I-AA. With the nation scrutinizing Michigan's loss to Appalachian State on Sept. 1, Prince made it apparent that his team would not be taking any games for granted.

"Over time, you've seen these things occur before," Prince said. "I would never refer to it as a lower level."

"It's not like they don't have great coaching or great players. They just don't have the volume of them."

"(Missouri State) is going to be a challenging team. They have a terrific offense, and I'm very concerned about them."

TAKING CONTROL OF THE PENALTY SITUATION

K-State appeared to have slightly better control of its penalty problems last weekend. After getting whistled for 16 penalties against Auburn, the Wildcats had nine yellow flags for 96 yards against San Jose State.

"We've got to get (our penalties) under control this week," Prince said. "Defensively, our penalties have been the most concerning. To come back and have a facemask penalty in week two after having one in week one is just unbelievable. We have to make sure that we get that cleaned up."

However, Prince said those committing numerous penalties definitely were being noticed by the coaching staff.

"Every player is responsible for his own penalties," he said. "We have to make sure, as a coaching staff, that we're teaching them what the officials are looking for and what is illegal. I'm not anxious to hear a bunch of excuses about penalties. I'm used to being on a team that didn't have any."

The high note, Prince said, was the reduction in penalties from the offensive line. K-State was only whistled for two offensive line penalties, one false start and one delay of game against San Jose State.

lecture — pre-planned — next year in his classes.

"If we had 434 more (House representatives) like this, it'd be a hell of a better country," Flinchbaugh said.

Billy Harris, junior in agricultural economics, said he had not met or spoke with Moran prior to Monday. Moran initially sat next to Harris before the class started.

"It was a real shocker," Harris said. "I got to speak with him briefly, and he was a really nice guy."

Harris said it was interesting to hear Moran speak about the Farm Bill that the U.S. House of Representatives passed July 27. The bill makes historic investments in fruit and vegetable production, conservation, nutrition and renewable energy, according to the House Committee on Agriculture Web site.

"It was interesting to see how no-nonsense of a representative that he is," Harris said. "It's been reiterated that he actually is here for Kansas and for agriculture."

K-State Students determine their success in online classes

By Whitney Hodgin
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Success in online classes depends on the student's dedication to learning course material outside of a traditional classroom setting.

In other words, students who actively participate in class have a higher chance of succeeding in online courses, said Julie Thornton, computer science instructor.

On the other hand, students who lack discipline in their academic lives might find online classes more frustrating than convenient, she said.

According to the online education page on K-State's Web site, www.dce.ksu.edu, there are 505 online classes offered by every college except the College of Veterinary Medicine.

These classes incorporate a combination of teaching tools like compact discs, chat rooms, message boards, on-line assignments and interactive technology that provides students with more than text on a screen.

Undergraduate and graduate degrees are available, as are credit and non-credit courses.

Online courses are popular among students who have difficulty adhering to the non-negotiable schedules of classes that require regular attendance and participation, Thornton said.

Family obligations and jobs often conflict with traditional class requirements.

"Online classes are better because they allow you to finish your degree on your own time," said Burke Lavalley, junior in open option, who is enrolled in an integrated social science class. "I worked at a golf course while taking online classes, so I was able to pay for them without accruing debt, which was enormously helpful."

Some feel the lack of classroom interaction between students and teachers weakens the effectiveness of classes they "attend" on their personal computers from anywhere with Internet connection.

"Anyone can put text and tests online," said Paul Hamilton, junior in mechanical engineering. "It's the experience of going to class, participating in labs and interacting with teachers that helps me learn information. Classrooms force me to do the work, since I never get around to watching lectures posted online."

Teachers who have taught online courses say they have noticed a correlation between student motivation and success in online classes.

Gerald Reeck has taught online classes for 10 years and currently leads a general biochemistry class online.

"Online courses require a lot of individual motivation, commitment and organization," he said. "Some students sign up for online classes without realizing the workload could be as much or more than their other classes."

Despite the requirements, Reeck said the success of either medium depends on the individual study habits and commitment of those enrolled.

"It's not a matter of one format being better than the other, it's which one is best for the student," he said. "Their success depends on their level of interest and dedication."

The value of online classes to potential employers rests on the credibility of the institution from which the classes were taken.

Since K-State is a credited university, all courses are considered valid credit.

"There are a lot of great online universities that are credited and aren't looking down on by employers," Thornton said.

Walk-in, online services provide advice, help in building résumés

By Erin Fisher and Salena Strate
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Résumés give future employers a brief description of work experience and qualifications, but they must be free of mistakes.

Help for improving résumés can come from a variety of resources, like Career and Employment Services or the Internet.

"There are some good external resources, but quite frankly, this is what students are putting their tuition and fee dollars toward," said Kerri Day Keller, director of CES. "Students can utilize sources. We work with hundreds of employers."

Keller suggested students bring in a draft of their résumés. Also, CES gives students a guide on its Web site, www.ksu.edu/ces.

Résumé software is also available upon request for students who come in.

Keller said more than 800 students use the online résumé help from CES because it is free.

"We offer a variety of different kinds of ways that students can get some help," she said. "We do offer individual students to come in to meet with an adviser."

Résumé critique sites are also available, but they offer no face-to-face interaction.

Ron Johnson, professor of journalism, requires students in his Editing and Design classes to create résumés.

Johnson said he recommends students be very cautious and think twice before paying any money for online critique services.

However, he did suggest students get help with their résumés.

"Any feedback that you get on your résumé is probably good," Johnson said. "You need to polish your résumé to the point that you are tired of polishing."

He also said a more personal critique is better because mistakes are explained in more detail.

Jason Jandera, senior in hotel and restaurant management, said he probably would not use online résumé help.

"It gives you a way to get your résumé looked at by someone other than your own age," Jandera said. "The cost is free at CES and is definitely much better."

Another Web site, www.10minuteresume.com, offers a free trial for people who want to have their résumé critiqued.

After the first trial, services increase to $59.95 annually or $9.95 monthly.

No matter the method, most agree it is important students seek another pair of eyes to help work out the kinks in their résumés.

"The more feedback that you can get from people," Johnson said, "the better off you are going to be."

Campus services offer ways to plan from college to career

By Mark Wampler
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

With thousands of class and career options, it is easy to get frustrated and overwhelmed.

It can be hard to distinguish a hobby from a career, tricky to narrow down interests and talents, and with 70 percent of students changing majors at least once in their college career, it can be expensive, said Michelle Haupt, coordinator for the Academic and Career Information Center.

Information is the foundation of good decisions, Haupt said, and not just any information, but specific information about yourself.

While it might seem strange to need to learn things about oneself, many people are not necessarily aware of the talents and interests that would lead them to get a job they would strive in and enjoy.

Haupt said it is necessary for students to get an understanding of where they are and establish short- and long-term visions that will guide them where they want to go in school, work and life.

A practical way to start the process is to take a vocational test.

The vocational tests allow students to objectively see what types of jobs their skills line up with and what would be a good fit for them.

"The tests allow students to really assess themselves," Haupt said. "The more they know about themselves, the better decisions they will be able to make."

Career and Employment Services offers career-development timelines available that map out ideal actions for each year of college.

Jacque Elliott, freshman in pre-professional secondary education, said she has not had the time in the first weeks of college to sit down with an adviser and map out her classes and goals, but she recognizes the helpfulness of that kind of planning.

"I think it would really benefit a person to plan out their four years," she said. "I just haven't had the time."

Elliott did manage to take a vocational test in high school, however, and she said that they were helpful in showing which careers people would be good at.

The ACIC offers these tests along with services to continue where the assessment tests leave off. Haupt pointed out one-on-one staff help, a majors fair, and Web site resources to help students get ideas and direction.

Discover — an Internet career program — is just one of the valuable Web site tools the ACIC offers.

After students get in touch with the office, a staff member will set up a Discover account for them, and they will be able to explore the program.

It offers specific search options that pull up careers matching the selected likes, dislikes and personality traits that one chooses, average pay comparison for careers in all 50 states, relevant information related to careers, like the growth and availability rate of a specific field, and much more.

"Students benefit from just exploring what's out there," Haupt said.

Once the thought and planning process has progressed, the bread and butter of the whole process is an internship.

"We are big advocates for internships. Students gain valuable experience and get to test out career availability," said Kerri Keller, CES director.

Companies also tend to hire the people who have extra experience. An internship allows people to get themselves out to learn more about their field before they actually apply for jobs.

"A growing number of employers are turning interns into full-time employees," Keller said. "They are looking for that experience."

Haupt said she also thinks that experience gained from an internship is one of the most important aspects in the process of searching for jobs.

"The opportunity to gain experience — that's crucial," she said. "You should be working for experience."

Jessica Bigger, academic adviser for journalism, said the first semester can be overwhelming for many freshmen.

"Usually we don't start heavy academic planning with freshmen," she said. "I like them to have a graduation plan in their hand by the time they apply to their major. That's usually during sophomore year."

Bigger said she thinks freshmen really just need to focus on making the transition to college.

"That first year is kind of an exploration year," she said. "They need to get an idea of where they're going."

Federally funded program helps place disabled students in jobs

By Dawn Murphy
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Some might think disabled students have trouble finding jobs, but because of the American Disabilities Act of 1990 and section 504 of the Rehabilitation Act of 1974, the law states that no public institution has the right to discriminate against U.S. citizens with disabilities.

Andrea Blair, director of Disabled Student Services, said DSS works with Career and Employment Services to help disabled students find jobs.

"We have something called WRP — the Workforce Recruitment Program," Blair said. "It's a government-funded program, and many disabled students find jobs during or after college through this program."

Blair said DSS and CES work together concerning disability employment issues like when a student should disclose their disabilities to their employer, how to handle physical access and also how to guide students who might face discrimination in the workplace.

"In regards to K-State, a student with a disability is a student whose disability impacts them in a way that results in their ability to have full access to K-State's programs and services," Blair said.

Kerri Day Keller, director of CES, said the staff members at CES are comfortable referring students to DSS and also that DSS is comfortable referring students to CES, so that they are working collaboratively to meet the career development needs of students with disabilities.

"Students meet with reps from WRP for interviews in Holtz Hall," Keller said. "Our staff also provides mock interviews and résumé assistance to students in preparation for this program."

"We seek out additional resources and training opportunities for students and CES staff."

Several book resources in the CES library include "Job-Hunting for the Handicapped" and "Job Search Handbook for People with Disabilities."

Last spring, several DSS and CES staff members attended a regional workshop with speakers from Career Opportunities for Students with Disabilities.

Blair said she had one student from Guatemala receive a social work job through the program who is now an advocate for Hispanic works, and a second student got a job teaching history in Shawnee Mission, Kan., and just received a Teacher of the Year award this year.

Natascha Henderson, senior in park management and conservation, has dyslexia.

"I was diagnosed at the age of four," said Henderson. "I felt different from everyone else in a lot of ways."

Henderson said it was a former teacher at Enterprise Academy, as well as her parents, who gave her the encouragement to go to K-State.

"I have very supportive parents," Henderson said. "They've supported me through everything." Henderson said she has had nothing but good experiences at K-State.

"I like the support and people from DSS," she said. "They're absolutely wonderful and give me the encouragement that I need."

Henderson worked at Rock Springs 4-H Center this summer.

"Working at Rock Springs has been one of the most rewarding experiences of my life so far. That place is awesome," Henderson said.

John Deterding is a freshman in engineering. He has Attention Deficit Disorder and cerebral palsy.

"I've had some really good experiences up at K-State so far," Deterding said. "I like it here."

Deterding was raised only 25 minutes from Lawrence but decided instead to come to K-State.

He said he likes that the K-State campus is pretty accessible.

"I had only crutches before I got to K-State," Deterding said. "But now I got this motorized chair. It's easier to get around with, plus it's more fun."

Deterding said he is busy with coursework and does not have much free time, but he said it is OK because he will not have to deal with his ADD much that way.

"I'm an option-option (student) within the College of Engineering but haven't really thought about careers yet," he said. "I've been here only three weeks."

7 TIPS TO A GREAT HANDSHAKE:

1. Eye contact. It's not just about your hand — a lot is said with your face.
2. Thumbs are key. Make sure to have a full handshake, not a finger shake — lock those thumbs.
3. Firm, not overpowering. Don't crush the other person's hand, but adjust according to their firmness.
4. Up and down motion. Remember not to shake back and forth.
5. Length of shake. Adjust the duration according to comfort level and how well you know the person.
6. Smile. After all, you don't want to seem unapproachable, and end the handshake again with eye contact.
7. Learn cultures. Don't offend people if you are traveling to another country; learn the handshake etiquette before you go.

Students should bring back greeting tradition to make 1st impression with employers

In most cultures, there is one way to say "nice to meet you" — with a handshake.

They vary in form, but most cultures believe it is unacceptable to not shake hands when meeting someone new or even meeting a longtime friend.

Rebecca Christner, grad-

SARAH

uate student in journalism, gave a presentation on August 30 about interviews and etiquette. She spoke about how much a handshake can say about a person, which made me wonder why I don't see people shake hands very much at all.

It could be the fact that we are in college and don't really care about etiquette, but no matter which career students choose to enter after graduation, first impressions are the key to landing a great job.

When most people think of first impressions, what comes to mind is clothing or the way they carry themselves, and while that is important, a handshake is something people will remember.

Most people don't want to be remembered in a negative way or simply forgotten before they even get out of the door.

Employers want to know their future employees are willing to take charge but not take over.

Employers believe all this information can be found with just a handshake.

A good firm handshake can show you are in control, ready for responsibility but that you are not going to be overzealous about it.

A knuckle-crushing handshake can lead people to believe you might be overbearing and pushy.

And a weak handshake can make employers believe you are a follower who will not step up.

Though handshakes are important, sometimes people will refuse a handshake for no reason.

Just relax your arm and move on, because that's not for you to worry about — let them realize their own rudeness.

Remember to be aware of what your hands feel like too.

People typically don't want to touch — let alone shake — hands that are sweaty or clammy. It is also OK to refuse a handshake as long as a brief explanation is given. "Sorry, I have a cold," is a good excuse.

Knowing when and how to shake hands is equally as important as what clothes are worn and what is said in the interview, so be aware and hopefully it will pay off in the end.

General speaks to Senate Tuesday

By Mike Kelly
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Rapid redeployment of troops will instigate fighting rather than working toward resolution, the U.S. ambassador to Iraq told the Senate on Tuesday.

Ryan Crocker, U.S. ambassador to Iraq, and Gen. David Petraeus, head of multinational forces in Iraq, completed their second day of testimony on Capitol Hill for a total of six hours in front of the Senate Foreign Affairs and Armed Services committees. Crocker reiterated that times are tough in Iraq, but leaving now only would build up walls and reload rifles.

"Iraq is experiencing a revolution, not just regime change," Crocker said. "It is only by understanding this that we can appreciate what is happening in Iraq and what Iraqis have achieved, as well as maintain a sense of realism about the challenges that remain."

The Associated Press reported Tuesday a senior official close to President Bush said the president will announce plans later this week to withdraw approximately 30,000 U.S. troops from Iraq, accepting the recommendation given by the top U.S. General in Iraq.

Gen. Petraeus said one Marine unit might come home in September, while the bulk of the "surge" will return in mid July, but decisions on further withdrawals should be put off until March.

"We will, no later than that time, consider factors similar to those on which I based the current recommendations, having by then, of course, a better feel for the security situation, the improvements in the capabilities of our Iraqi counterparts and the enemy situation," Petraeus said.

He said the surge campaign mostly has met its military goals, reducing sectarian killings by more than 50 percent nationwide and by more than 80 percent in Baghdad. He said U.S. objectives in Iraq still can be met, although doing so will be neither quick nor easy.

"Overall, our tactical commanders see improvement in the security environment," Petraeus said.

Sen. Feingold, D-Wisc., asked Petraeus when a drop in the number of American deaths in Iraq could be expected.

"We are on the offensive, and when you go on the offensive, you have tough fighting," Petraeus said.

In response to the testimony, Sen. Sam Brownback, R-Kan., reinforced his idea for a sectarian-divided Iraq.

"We should promote the development of a Sunni region to take advantage of the situation described today by Gen. Petraeus and Ambassador Crocker," Brownback said. "Sunni previously opposed the creation of new regions in Iraq, but they are now beginning to see the advantages of a federal system."

"We should not wait for national reconciliation to take advantage of the bottom-up political progress in Anbar province and create a Sunni region that would play an integral role in a united Iraq."

Tuesday's hearings were held on the sixth anniversary of the Sept. 11 attacks. Sen. Barack Obama, D-Ill., objected to the date of the hearing and said it creates a false association.

"I think we should not have had this discussion on 9/11. Or 9/10, or 9/12," Obama said. "Because I think it perpetuates the notion that the original decision to go into Iraq was directly related to the attacks on 9/11."

The Usual Suspects

Owners say upbringing determines behavior, not breed

By Dawn Murphy
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Kara Rogers adores her two dogs like they are her children.

They are eager but obedient to their owner. They are not aggressive toward strangers. They are pit bulls.

The dogs' breeds have many negative misconceptions, like being vicious and having an aggression toward people and other animals.

Rogers, a second-year student in veterinary medicine, said Bean, a 2-year-old American Pit Bull Terrier, and Tyson, a 6-year-old American Staffordshire Terrier, have several qualities that set them apart from the stereotypes associated with the dogs.

Both of my dogs are well socialized, loved and cared for as if they were my own children," she said. "There is nothing I wouldn't do for them to make them happy and healthy."

"That's discriminatory to pass judgment on a dog because of its breed. It all depends on the owner and how they raise their dog. You can raise any dog to be a well-mannered, social, people-loving dog if you raise it with the proper socialization and care it needs."

According to chapter six, section 6-25 of the Code of Ordinances, "any keeper or harbinger of a dog that is a size and breed that allows the dog to be capable of inflicting life-threatening injuries upon human beings or domestic animals is hereby held to a very high standard of care."

The section lists 12 dogs as examples of dangerous dogs, and the breeds of Rogers' dogs are on the list in the higher-care standard of the city ordinance.

Mayor Tom Phillips said a dog's behavior is the responsibility of the owner.

"Dog owners need to be held accountable for ill-behaved, aggressive dogs," Phillips said. "With larger dogs comes more responsibility for proper canine ownership. That is the purpose for the higher care standard clause."

Phillips said the city staff conducted research and found those particular breeds had a higher propensity for aggressive behavior due to their nature or size.

"We wanted to be sure that owners of these types of dogs were aware of the dog's possible propensity of aggressive behavior," he said. "That way it prevents them from coming to court and saying they had no idea their dog could be dangerous or aggressive if their dog were to attack or bite someone."

Phillips said there was a request by some citizens to draft new rules and regulations to the city dog ordinance that would ban specific breeds of dogs, but the legislation never passed this summer because of opposition.

"We had a lot of vet students or people associated with the Veterinary School up at K-State, as well as a few Manhattan citizens, come in and tell the city staff why they thought breed-specific legislation wouldn't work," he said. "They showed us research results from other places that had BSL (breed-specific legislation) and why it wasn't effective."

Lori Neer, a registered veterinary technician, is the president of the Manhattan Association of Responsible Canine Ownership, a group founded in fall 2006 in response to the proposed ban breed.

She said she spoke against the legisla-

No increase in parking tickets because of construction

By Elise Podhajsky
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Parking tickets on campus have not increased because of parking garage construction, the director of parking services said.

At the beginning of every school year, parking services officials have been lenient in issuing tickets because they recognize many people have not yet picked up their parking passes, and people who are new to campus do not quite understand the rules yet, Director Darwin Abbott said.

This semester, because of all the parking changes, Abbott said students and faculty have had to work to get a citation.

However, off-campus traffic has had plenty of time to adjust, and parking services is beginning to push people into their designated parking areas, Abbott said. But even if parking services had not been lenient in the first month of school, he said the number of tickets still would be down from past years.

"The great bulk of tickets came from the metered lot south of the Union," Abbott said.

"With those gone, and because of the shuttle, we're writing fewer tickets."

But one parking issue that has not changed is students illegally parking in lots designated for buildings like the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art and the K-State Alumni Center.

Steve Logback, Alumni Center director of communications, said the center's main concern is making sure visitors of the center, which often include students have a palace to park.

"We're not looking at any particular groups," he said. "We just want to make sure we are able to provide enough space for our guests."

Abbott said he thought the parking situation will remain easy during the school year and will become less of a problem with the completion of the Union garage.

But some off-campus students are trying to avoid parking by choosing alternative methods of transportation. Mikkel Kjelskus, senior in civil engineering, said he rides his bicycle to class everyday to ensure he does not receive a parking ticket.

"I bought (my bicycle) when I first moved to Manhattan because for the cost of a parking permit, I could practically buy a bike," he said. "Besides almost getting run over by cars and occasionally getting made fun of — since I'm a big guy on a bicycle — it's a really good experience."

Kjelskus said his advice to those students who are struggling with the current parking situation is to invest in a bike.

"It's great exercise, and if everyone rode a bike, I wouldn't look nearly as dorky," he said.

ACTRESS PICKS UP DUI

CULVER CITY, Calif. — Kirsten Storms, who voices the snippy cheerleader Bonnie Rockwaller in the animated Disney TV series "Kim Possible," was charged with driving under the influence of alcohol after she was pulled over in her Mercedes was pulled over, authorities said.

Storms, who also appears in the daytime soap opera "General Hospital," was stopped Friday in the Los Angeles suburb after California Highway Patrol officers said they saw a lit cigarette tossed from her blue Mercedes-Benz at about 3 a.m.

Officers noticed "the odor of an alcoholic beverage" coming from the car, according to an arrest report. Storms was arrested after failing field sobriety tests, according to the report.

She was jailed on the misdemeanor and released several hours later after posting $5,000 bail, authorities said.

A call to a representative for the actress was not immediately returned.

Storms' Rockwaller is the high-school social rival to superhero Kim Possible on the long-running Disney series. She also plays Maxie Jones on ABC's "General Hospital" and was Belle Black on NBC's "Days of Our Lives" from 1999 to 2004.

FREQUENCIES HELP BURN SALT

ERIE, Pa. — An Erie, Pa., cancer researcher has found a way to burn salt water, a novel invention that is being touted by one chemist as the "most remarkable" water science discovery in a century.

John Kanzius accidentally made the discovery when he tried to desalinate seawater with a radio-frequency generator he developed to treat cancer.

He discovered that as long as the salt water was exposed to the radio frequencies, it would burn.

The discovery has scientists excited about the prospect of using salt water, the most abundant resource on earth, as a fuel.

Rustum Roy, a Penn State University chemist, has held demonstrations in his lab to confirm his own observations.

The radio frequencies act to weaken the bonds between the elements that make up salt water, releasing the hydrogen, Roy said.

Once ignited, the hydrogen will burn as long as it is exposed to the frequencies, he said.

The discovery is "the most remarkable in water science in 100 years," Roy said.

EMMYS CUTS JESUS REMARK

LOS ANGELES — Comic Kathy Griffin's "offensive" remarks about Jesus at the Creative Arts Emmy Awards will be cut from a pre-taped telecast of the show, the Academy of Television Arts and Sciences said Tuesday.

Griffin made the provocative comment on Saturday night as she took the stage of the Shrine Auditorium to collect her Emmy for best reality program for her Bravo channel show "My Life on the D-List."

"A lot of people come up here and thank Jesus for this award. I want you to know that no one had less to do with this award than Jesus," an exultant Griffin said, holding up her statuette.

"Suck it, Jesus. This award is my god now."

Asked about her speech backstage a short time later, an unrepentant Griffin added, "I hope I offended some people. I didn't want to win the Emmy for nothing."

The speech drew fire from a leading Roman Catholic group, the Catholic League for Religious and Civil Rights, which condemned Griffin's remarks as "obscene and blasphemous."

Chamber to receive $40,000

By Nicholas Birdsong
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Commissioners approved the Manhattan Area Chamber of Commerce's request for $40,000 to assist a Manhattan shopping marketing campaign Tuesday evening at the city commission meeting.

The 24/7 Campaign will launch a series of advertisements aimed at bringing shoppers from the surrounding area said Lyle Butler, chamber president.

"We want to become more aggressive to bring more consumers to Manhattan," Butler said. "The goal of the campaign is to make Manhattan the regional shopping center."

The Manhattan City Commission approved the funding 4-0, with Commissioner Ed Snead not present.

"The question I always ask is how does the average citizen benefit from this," Commissioner Mark Hatesohl said. "I think we are getting a pretty good return on our investment."

A similar campaign took place in 2005, coinciding with a 5.6-percent increase in the Manhattan customer base, according to an independent research study prepared by David L. Darling, an independent consultant and professor of agricultural economics at K-State. The study attributed a portion of the increase to the 2005-06 marketing campaign.

Darling's surveys showed 20 percent of respondents said the campaign motivated them to shop in Manhattan.

"It's a good investment in our town," Commissioner Bob Strawn said. "Hopefully it will reflect on property taxes."

No remarks were made by community members regarding the motion to provide the chamber with the funds.

Commissioners also unanimously approved the rezoning request for the Sumac Drive area. Rezoning is the first step toward construction in the area, which would produce eight new homes with an estimated value of more than $250,000.

Moran discusses importance of politics to college students

By Adrienne DeWeese
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Jerry Moran surprised his friend — professor Jerry Flinchbaugh — Tuesday afternoon after sitting through the beginning of Flinchbaugh's Agriculture Policy class as a student.

Moran, who represents the "Big 1st" Congressional District in the U.S. House of Representatives, talked about the difference between politics and policy during the Agriculture Policy class.

Moran discussed students' relationship with politics.

What is the role of K-State students in Kansas and the Midwest?

Obviously, K-State is a premiere institution. Many Kansans — certainly from our state of Kansas — but from surrounding states come here to school, and in my opinion, have the opportunity to receive a broad education that is very valuable to them.

In my particular circumstance, many of the people who work for me as a member of Congress are former K-State students. Most of our interns that we've had over my 12 years in Congress have been K-State students, so we have a very close tie to students who are here in our internship program, and the graduates are a very important component in me developing good policy for the country.

For what reasons is it important for K-State students to care about politics?

The decisions that are made by Congress, by our national leaders, by the next administration, will affect the students much more than they will affect somebody my age. The things that we are deciding today have consequences throughout the lives of people who are 18-22 years old.

So it's very important that their input is obtained, that they pay attention. I know how difficult that is. It's easy to be cynical about elected officials. It's easy to get busy with studies and social life. So, it's not an easy thing, necessarily, for students to be engaged in politics, but I think it's very important for them to do so because they need to have input on decisions that are made today, as it will affect them and their families in the future.

What do you do to reach out for students' votes? For what reasons do you value the 18-to-22-year-old demographic?

I live in a university town, and so I'm very closely associated with Fort Hays State University. I'm an adjunct professor of political science at Fort Hays, and so I'm in the classroom there from time-to-time. But I also look for opportunities to be in high-school government classes, as well as college political science classes, in which I hope to reach out to students.

It's not necessarily political or garnering their votes, but I think I have a lot to learn. I enjoy being around students. I enjoy being around people who are 18-22 years old. I think that the goal is that we connect, so that I learn from them and maybe they learn something from me. But it's usually an inspiration. It's a reminder that the job I have in Washington is important because it affects the future of these folks I know and care about.

TO THE POINT

Students need to be aware of fund usage

You get what you pay for.

Students contribute more than $300 per semester for privilege fees. This amount might seem like a small fraction in the grand tuition total, but it provides a large part of the funding for services like the K-State Student Union, Lafene Health Center and bonds.

As spenders, it is our responsibility to learn where our money goes and what services we receive with them. Students should utilize the services available to them right here on campus.

The Union, Lafene and Peters Recreation Complex have many resources available for students, so we should take advantage of them since we help fund them each semester.

If students have concerns about where their fees go, they should voice their opinions at Student Senate meetings Thursday nights in the Big 12 Room at the Union.

The Privilege Fee Committee within Student Senate works to review the privilege-fee funded areas, and student input is valuable to what is funded through privilege fees.

Privilege Fee Committee members endure the tedious procedure each year of reviewing one-third of areas funded through privilege fees. Since students fund privilege fees, their input is invaluable to the Student Governing Association.

As students who help fund this university, it is only to our benefit to learn where our money is going and responsibly take advantage of the services provided to us as a result.

TO THE POINT is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

A marching contradiction

Phelps crusade yells one thing, preaches another

"Thank God for 9/11. Thank God for (Improvised Explosive Devices). God hates Fags." These words came from the mouth of one of the most evil and vile women in today's world.

They came just one day before the sixth anniversary of the Sept. 11 attacks when I talked with Shirley Phelps on my weekly talk show, which airs Mondays at 5 p.m. on The Wildcat 91.9.

I asked Phelps how she planned to commemorate the anniversary of the worst terrorist attack on U.S. soil. She said she planned to stand on the streets waving the notorious signs of the Westboro Baptist Church.

She corrected me and called those who attacked our country "so-called terrorists." Phelps said, "9/11 was the beginning of sorrows for this nation ... It's too late for this nation ... God is your terrorist."

The anger that poured out of this woman's mouth was absolutely incredible. What happened to the love Jesus Christ taught on the Sermon on the Mount? What happened to the God of Peace so many individuals have come to embrace and accept into their lives?

According to Phelps, the Christ who gave the Sermon on the Mount is the same Christ who hates the United States. The God of Peace is the same one who is pleased when Phelps and her cronies picket funerals of fallen soldiers. Those same soldiers who gave their lives so Phelps can do and say what she does freely.

Love. Peace. Hate. These are all synonymous with the word of God that Phelps' father, Fred, preaches from. In one of his notorious sermons, he preached, "It's too late to pray for America. It's a sin to pray for America."

Then why, Mrs. Phelps, do you protest on Sept. 11? After a few seconds of dead air, she answered, "You have a duty to the Lord your God." This must be the same duty that entails individuals holding signs with hate speech, but excludes praying for the United States.

Contradiction riddles the beliefs of Phelps and the Westboro Baptist Church. The God of Peace is full of hatred. It is a sin to pray for America, yet it is acceptable to preach God hates America. It is mind-numbing.

This kind of thinking is terrifying, to say the least. For individuals to actually embrace this sort of doctrine is, for a lack of a better term, insane.

The only hope U.S. citizens have for the end of this psychotic church is if the Phelps' stop having children. Shirley Phelps is the third of eight daughters. She is the mother of 11 children. The only way this church of 72 souls continues to thrive is because of the sick reproduction taking place. It is easy to invite individuals into a system of beliefs when those individuals are brainwashed from their first breath.

Sept. 11 always will be a day of solemnity, reverence and peaceful reflection. What the Phelps' do is sickening and an unbelievable disrespect to this nation.

Their actions are comparable to radical Islamists who wage war on this country and its allies; after all, she prays God will continue sending soldiers back home in body bags.

When confronted with the idea she is no better than a radical Islamist, I could feel the love of Christ through the telephone.

Her response was simply, "You're a smarmy little weasel."

CHUCK ARMSTRONG

Nate Schmidt | COLLEGIAN

People should use profanity with responsibility

The United States is based on the idea of freedom of speech and expression.

Foul language crosses the line between the freedom of speech of one and the freedom of expression of another. We might cross the line by using these obscenities around other people, but that does not mean anyone should be restricted from what they want to say.

During a recent floor meeting at an unnamed residence hall on campus, it became apparent that today is not like it used to be. Today we can use foul language almost anywhere; in the workplace, school, and to some, it is even acceptable in the home. These derogatory statements in our society usually further stereotypes and prejudices.

According to Citizens for Community Values, the definition of broadcast indecency stated by the U.S. Supreme Court is described as "language that, in context, depicts or describes, in terms patently offensive as measured by contemporary community standards in the broadcast medium, sexual or excretory activities or organs."

Citizens for Community Values states they are "diligent in our efforts to encourage and affect legislation that protects family, and oppose legislation that is harmful to those Judeo-Christian moral values upon which this country was founded."

Even though there are rules against obscenity, many words still are allowed in public media. Most are in good taste; however, ideas of sex and deeper plots with more vulgar words usually are reserved for late-night television.

Foul language is used on television to convey many different messages. It can portray class or the severity of what is being said. It doesn't matter what the reasons for it are — kids have been watching too much television and believe it is socially acceptable in all cases.

Take for example the K-State vs. San Jose State game last week. There were a few questionable calls made by the referees and — what seemed like the entire student section — yelled obscene language at the field.

One could even hear the ever-discriminating "that's retarded" or "that's gay."

College is the real world. Students are preparing themselves for the realities life. People are going to be forced to deal with more stereotypes than others. Life's not fair; learn to deal and overcome these obstacles.

Society today must be politically correct, we're forced to use terms like the "waste management specialist." Presidential candidates try not to use profane language in public; I can't even use an example of profane language in this column because of restrictions on obscenity.

Limiting certain obscenities because they poke and prod at more socially unacceptable people is not the real world.

The people who are offended but never stand up for themselves are just as guilty as the perpetrators who said it.

We are all responsible for the stereotypes and prejudices in this world. Margaret Mead, acclaimed anthropologist, said it best: "Never doubt that a small group of thoughtful, committed people can change the world. Indeed, it is the only thing that ever has."

The concept to follow is this: Don't tell people what they can and cannot say. I, as well as other U.S. citizens, can say what I want, and no one can tell me differently. However, with privilege comes responsibility.

We should all try to use tact in situations. Just because you think it, doesn't mean you have to say it.

FROM THE VICE PRESIDENT

Students need to meet neighbors

As this is my first year not being a part of organized living, I am starting to get firsthand the scarcity of positive relationships among students and permanent residents here in Manhattan.

LYDIA PEELE

I have been living in my house since June and still don't know the people who live across from me. Myself included, it seems that we have forgotten the ancient tradition of bringing over fresh cookies to the new people down the street. Wouldn't it be nice to get a phone call from a neighbor asking you to turn your music down, rather than a knock on the door from the police?

Thanks to a task force of dedicated students and community members, action is being taken to help bring all members of our community together. As a part of K-State's City/University Fund request to the City of Manhattan, money has been allocated for a Good Neighbors Program. In the past year we have researched other universities, brainstormed ideas and planning for the future of our program.

This semester, the program will begin with two events – the first being this Sunday. Student Governing Association and the City of Manhattan will sponsor a few free Call Hall Ice Cream socials. The locations are in the 1800 block of Fairchild, 700 block of Thurston and 900 block of Vattier. Ice cream will be served from 6 to 7 p.m. I would like to encourage all who are able to participate, and if you would like to be more involved, please contact the new Student Coordinator, Moriah Wagner, at mowag@ksu.edu. Go Cats!

Dating Doctor gives 5th talk at K-State

By Adrienne DeWeese
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Be the fat penguin. Break the ice.

Laughter filled Forum Hall Tuesday night as David Coleman, "The Dating Doctor," used humor and bluntness to encourage audience members to make the first move when approaching those they are interested in romantically.

Coleman said making the first initiative in talking to another person is like being an overweight penguin who breaks a layer of ice.

"It's not about your appearance," Coleman said. "It's about your attitude."

Coleman, who has presented at K-State five times, is the real-life inspiration for the 2004 romantic-comedy "Hitch" starring Will Smith and Kevin James. About 75 percent of the movie is actually true about Coleman and his experiences, he said.

During his presentation, Coleman listed the five-minute find, which consists of the ABCs of initial interest – attraction, believability, chemistry and desire to learn more about a person. The ABCs determine if someone is interested in another person within the first five minutes of meeting, he said.

Coleman said a TV station has offered him his own show, which would be called "Boyfriend Boot Camp."

Casting calls might take place through Coleman's Facebook.com site, he said.

Marijuana should be legal

Editor,

I commend Cassandre Braden for her article in favor of the decriminalization of marijuana. It is rare to see such an example of well-researched journalism, and student journalists like Braden should be encouraged to persevere in their determination to use their skills to increase our understanding of important issues.

Though Braden appropriately points out the economic burdens of anti-marijuana policies, she also could have mentioned the social costs of making this a political football game and incarcerating thousands of good people instead of treating their use of marijuana as a matter of personal freedom or a mental health concern.

In a free society, the domain within which individuals make their own choices will be fairly large. From reports I have read, the marijuana "high" is somewhat similar to the natural feeling perhaps all of us experience walking across the K-State campus on slightly breezy autumn days, leaves drifting through the air around us.

The fact that this feeling is available without marijuana suggests the plant's effects could serve to remind people of a basic relationship to nature and what it means to be human, to be living.

We might rightly ask why marijuana users feel a need for these reminders, but as Braden suggests, it makes no more sense to prosecute, fine and imprison people for this behavior than it would to treat alcohol and tobacco users with similarly punitive measures. She makes a reasonable appeal for a new approach to marijuana in America.

Column promotes Nazi ideologies in United States

Editor,

The column on disease-ridden illegal immigrants from Mexico is an absolute outrage and a disgrace to an institution of higher learning that claims to produce critical thinkers.

"Nomen" seems to be "omen" here as Brigitte Brecheisen (Brigitte "Break-iron") is breaking her iron staff over the less privileged, thus resorting to the sort of blatant and uninformed argumentation the Third Reich employed 70 years ago in the context of migration and disease, namely that the wandering Jews and gypsies were disease carriers threatening the German nation and running down her economy.

Brecheisen's column is not only full of simplisticaly employed statistical evidence, it also smacks of the same kind of scapegoating and border-closing mentality that informs the ideologies of totalitarian societies.

Indeed, "if the United States wants to continue to be a strong prosperous nation we need" not "to learn to control the borders so as to protect our country from disease" but to protect this country from the diseased minds of the likes of Brecheisen.

If this is the new generation produced by seven years of Bush radicalism and holding a degree in political science and international studies from K-State, then I see little hope for America's future.

Memorial coverage necessary

Editor,

When I opened my paper this morning, I was extremely disappointed to find scant mention of the tragic events, which occurred a scarce six years ago today.

The omission not only fails to rouse us from our shameful forgetfulness, but also shows a disturbing lack of respect for the victims and aid workers affected.

Regardless of one's opinion on our nation's subsequent actions, those whose lives were changed forever deserve our respect and remembrance. This omission is an unfortunate oversight at best and a flagrantly disrespectful gesture at worst.

Wildcats must find discipline

It's believed in some circles around football that you see the greatest improvement in a team from week one to week two.

In other words, what you see in week two is a better sign of what's ahead than the first week. The questions that arose in the season opener are answered seven days later.

With that said, looking around the Big 12 North Division in the second week didn't really offer a lot of answers — mostly just more questions.

Actually, there was one answer. Iowa State is definitely terrible. It's going to be another long season for the Cyclones.

But other than that, have we really learned anything in the first two weeks? The only lesson we've learned so far is that the Big 12 North race is wide open.

Every team has a flaw. Missouri's defense is soft; Nebraska's quarterback is still iffy; Kansas hasn't played anybody; and Colorado still has a long way to go.

The team that can find a way to address its weakness most effectively will probably be the one heading to the Big 12 Championship Game in San Antonio.

K-State has perhaps the most curious flaw of all. It doesn't have to do with a glaring defensive hole or a lack of depth at a particular position. The Wildcats just need to stop beating themselves.

If they figure out a way to do that, it could be a special season.

K-State's win over San Jose State was probably one of the most boring games ever played this side of the spring game.

It was a two-possession game for the first three quarters, but the outcome never seemed in doubt. K-State had it in the bag the whole time, but the players just kept shooting themselves in the foot.

And this isn't just about penalties. Sure, those are bad, but it's also about the interceptions that are thrown for no apparent reason and the missed tackles on third down that lead to extended drives for the opponent.

It's a good sign that K-State made all those mistakes and still won by 20. But the fact that all those miscues have now happened two weeks in a row is not.

K-State has enough talent on offense to win the Big 12 North. The defense could be strong enough to carry the team when the offense has an off day. But none of that will matter if the Wildcats are still making themselves their most fearsome opponent when Big 12 play begins.

It's a good sign that the players recognize this. The mood around the Vanier Football Complex two days after the win was one of disgust. A casual observer probably would have thought the team lost.

After the game, Josh Freeman couldn't seem to talk about anything but his two interceptions. It didn't matter that he threw his first touchdown in 13 quarters. He knew he could have played better, and he appeared determined to correct his mistakes.

These players don't seem to be satisfied unless they play a near-perfect game. The good news is it won't take perfection to win the Big 12 North.

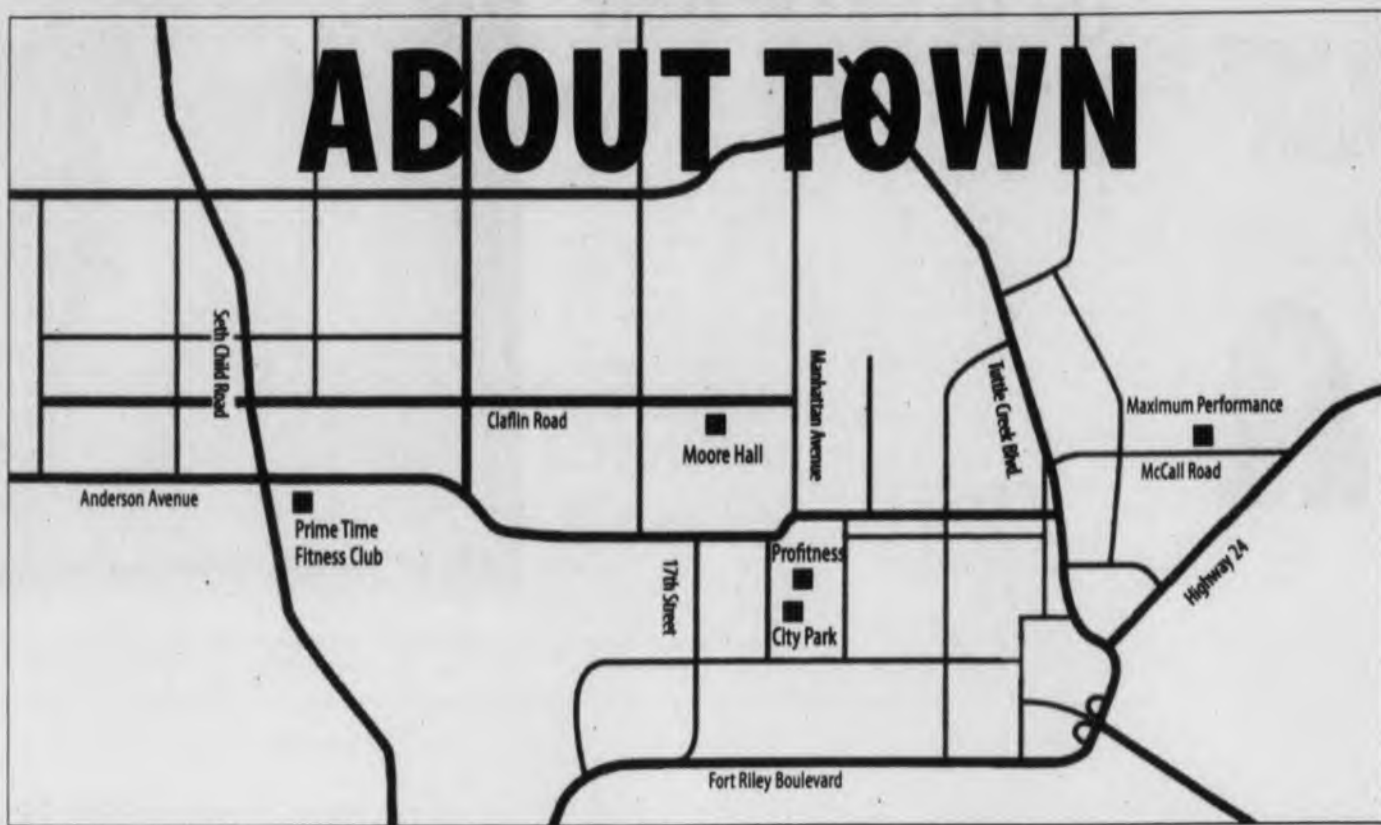

For the Wildcats, it might just take a little bit of discipline.

YOUR HEALTH

MANHATTAN CONVENTION AND VISITORS BUREAU

Students should exercise outside, around Manhattan

Maximum Performance is one of several gyms in Manhattan.

Residents can lift weights in the basement of Moore Hall.

City Park is a popular destination for dog-walkers and joggers.

The seasons are changing quickly. It won't be long before the weather turns nasty, and a whole new slew of exercisers pack the Peters Recreation Complex.

Why not enjoy the last few weeks of tolerable weather by exercising outside or exploring other exercise options?

If you live in the residence halls, you don't have to walk far to find an exercise opportunity (unlike finding your car, which could take hours). If you remember way back when you were a senior in high school and you took that campus tour, they probably mentioned something about a small fitness center in the dark recesses of the basement. That's right — most of the residence halls have a small collection of fitness equipment hiding down there.

Don't remember? Yeah, neither do a lot of other people. This means that you can, for the most part, work out alone without ever leaving the safety of your residence hall. While the choice of machines might not be top-notch, you still will find a dumbbell or two worth lifting. Check at the front desk for a key.

KENDALL HALL

For those of us who don't live in the residence halls and want to soak up as much vitamin D as we can, there are numerous parks around Manhattan.

Perhaps the most popular and obvious choice is City Park. Located in the middle of Manhattan between Poyntz Avenue and Aggieville, the park has a one-mile trail that's great for jogging or taking Fido for a walk. The park also has volleyball, basketball, softball and tennis facilities.

Linear Trail is another great place for running, walking, cycling or wearing out your significant other. Depending on where you access the trail, you can entertain yourself for a few minutes or a few hours. There are maps located along the way so you can plan ahead if your boyfriend or girlfriend is too heavy to carry back.

For more information about Manhattan parks, visit the city's Web site at <http://ci.manhattan.ks.us>.

If you're the type who loves the prairie, the Konza Prairie offers three trails for everyone to use. You don't have to be the most experienced hiker to complete the six-mile trail. The park is located just off Kansas Highway 177 on Konza Prairie Lane. This park is open from dawn until dusk, and pets are not permitted.

If you are more of a gym-goer and you have some cash to spend, you can always visit one of the other gyms in town. Pro Fitness in Aggieville, Prime Time Fitness Club, near West Loop and Maximum Performance, on McCall road are probably the most popular gyms besides the rec.

Keep in mind you are going to have to spend money for membership at other gyms — even if you are a student. You pay usage fees for the rec along with your tuition, but the rec isn't for everybody.

Membership fees vary, as does the atmosphere in different gyms.

Maybe you are the type of exerciser who doesn't like to be around a ton of hard bodies. Some gyms will suit your needs and preferences better than others. My advice is to visit and get a tour before making a decision and handing out your cash.

Manhattan offers quite the range of options for staying active. There are multiple gyms for every type of exerciser and a park for just about any activity you can think of, except surfing, but hey — you chose to come to school in the Midwest. So get online, find a park you haven't been to yet, and drag your still-hungry-from-the-tailgate roommate with you.

Wildcats to open Big 12 Conference play against Jayhawks in Lawrence

STAFF REPORT

The K-State volleyball team has swept its past three opponents and will look to make rival KU the fourth tonight at 7 p.m. in Lawrence.

The teams met in last year's regular-season finale with K-State defeating the Jayhawks at Ahearn Field House. K-State lost the first matchup last season 3-1 in Lawrence.

The Jayhawks will see a very different Wildcat attack this time around, as outside hitters Nataly Korobkova and Rita Liliom weren't a part of the team that split home and home with the Jayhawks last season.

Korobkova leads the Wildcats with 141 kills on .269 hitting, while Liliom has recorded 125 kills on the season.

The Wildcats enter conference play on a three-match winning streak after beating Fresno State, Northern Iowa and Arkansas in the Varney's Kansas State Invitational.

K-State's only preseason losses came against ranked opponents — No. 5 UCLA and No. 15 Hawaii at the Wahine Classic.

"We played some folks in the preseason," coach Suzie Fritz said following Saturday's 3-0 victory over Fresno State. "We had some teams that will be very comparable to the teams we'll face starting Wednesday night."

It will be the Big 12 Conference opener for both teams, and K-State will look to improve on its 7-4 record in conference openers. The Wildcats have lost two of the last three Big 12 openers.

KU (7-3) opened the season with wins over Cal State Bakersfield and Idaho State before dropping consecutive matches to Oregon, Michigan State and Florida. The Jayhawks come in with a five-match winning streak, including three straight in the Jayhawk Classic.

Outside hitters Jenna Kaiser and Plavia Lino lead KU in kills with 89 and 80, respectively.

Overall, the Wildcats hold a 20-2 record against KU since the formation of the Big 12 Conference.

Wildcats move up 3 spots to No. 19 in AVCA/CSTV Top 25

STAFF REPORT

The K-State volleyball squad moved up three spots in the latest American Volleyball Coaches Association Top 25 Poll, coming in at No. 19.

The Wildcats received 372 points after sweeping Arkansas, Northern Iowa and Fresno State in the Varney's Kansas State Invitational.

K-State was one of four Big 12 Conference teams in the latest poll, joining No. 1 Nebraska, No. 7 Texas and No. 25 Texas A&M.

Golf team takes 2nd at Chip-N-Club

The K-State women's golf team used a trio of individual top-10 performances second at the Chip-N-Club Invitational on Tuesday.

K-State shot a 19-over par 303, leaving the Wildcats just five strokes behind tournament winner Texas State in the 19-team field.

The Wildcats' finish at the par 71, 6,079-yard Woodland Hills Golf Club is their best since bringing home second in the Chip-N-Club Invitational in fall 2005.

"We're disappointed of course that we didn't win, but I think it was a great experience for the team," coach Kristi Knight said.

"To be in the hunt in the first tournament of the year and go through that experience, I think they can go from here and use this down the road to help them."

Senior Kali Quick finished tied for second place with a three-round total of 220. Sophomore Abbi Sumner finished sixth, and senior Michelle Regan placed 10th.

Privilege fees go to variety of services

By Scott Girard
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

All students must pay privilege fees, but few know where they actually go.

The money collected from student privilege fees goes to a number of student services and organizations, said Privilege Fee Committee Chair Clint Blaes.

More than 45 percent of the fees go to two places: the K-State Student Union and Lafene Health Center. Student health coverage and maintenance at Lafene accounts for more than one-third of the fees alone.

Blaes said the Lafene privilege fee raised significantly two years ago to account for rising costs of student health coverage. He said Lafene did not receive enough money for expanded health coverage and improving facilities for several years.

"Lafene was running in the red, and they needed money," Blaes said.

Full-time students — those with 12 or more credit hours — will pay $304.90 in privilege fees per semester.

Students with less than 12 credit hours pay privilege fees per credit hour. For those students, the first credit hour is $71.70 and all following credit hours are $21.20. Blaes said this system ensures fair payment for all students.

"It's not fair to those part-time students who are probably only taking one or two classes," he said. "They are probably not taking advantage of the facilities like full-time students."

Almost 20 percent of fees go to bonds used for expansions on the Peters Recreation Complex, Hale Library and the Union. Other fees go to student organizations, student media, K-State bands, University counseling services, sports club teams, Bramlage repair and maintenance and the Office of Student Activities and Services, among others.

Each year, the SGA privilege fee committee reviews one-third of the areas funded by privilege fees. This year the SGA will review KSDB-FM radio station, OSAS, student activities and rec fees.

The allocations committee, which is also part of the SGA, is in charge of budgeting and allocating money within student activity fees, which includes campus-wide organizations, multicultural organizations, student councils and academic competitions. Each year, the total money taken from student fees is divided among the separate groups.

Students pay $5 per semester for activity fees.

After fees are gathered, money, except for the money set aside for multicultural organizations, is placed in its respective reserve funds for costs throughout the fiscal year.

Bryan Cox, SGA treasurer and allocations committee chair, said the activity fees reserves are down from previous years, causing a crunch in the budget.

Because of insufficient funds and a smaller budget to work with, Cox said it may be hard to account for all campus groups and college councils.

Last year the allocations committee had close to $225,000 budgeted and $52,000 worth of reserve. This year, the student activities budget was cut $52,000 from last year with only $33,000 left in reserve.

"If we do what we did last year, we will be out probably over $20,000," Cox said.

To alleviate the problem, Cox proposed to limit travel funding for campus-wide organizations and college councils.

Cox said travel costs account for a tremendous amount of the budget. Travel accounted for more than 50 percent of campus organization allotments and more than 70 percent of college council allotments.

The proposal, which passed Sept. 6, states that campus-wide organizations and college councils have $1,000 available for up to two travel allocation requests per year.

Cox said this will save the committee more than $10,000 this fiscal year.

Cox said the allocations committee will have to be frugal throughout the semester to not run out of money. He said he hopes to receive more funding for next fiscal year.

"I will be asking for an increase in funds this year because the number of groups making requests are growing each year," he said.

Lori Gilmore, accountant for OSAS, said though the money left from last year's reserve is considerably lower than previous years, unspent money budgeted to organizations, which transfers to the next year's reserve, remained the same.

"Traditionally, not all student organizations spend the money they've been allotted," she said.

Blaes said he was not sure whether the privilege fee committee would raise the activities fees or not. He said SGA would review activities fees by the end of fall semester.

Overall, Blaes said he does not expect privilege fees to raise significantly.

He said the groups under review do not have a need for dramatic funding increases. Last year, SGA raised the privilege fees only $2.90 per student and he said he does not expect much difference this year.

Though the university might approve an expansion for the rec, Blaes said the fees will raise minimally, because the committee in charge of the rec is looking for alternative ways to fund the expansion.

"I think we should be able to keep the fees pretty stable," Blaes said.

Students explore academic world at fair

By Eric Davis
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Students' eyes were opened to a world of study abroad options in a crowded K-State Student Union Courtyard on Tuesday.

Study-abroad advisers provided information to students interested in the study abroad program.

Students from all areas of the university made it out to the fair to explore their options, which were showcased at various tables around the Union Courtyard.

Andrew Bowman, freshman in electrical engineering, said he attended the fair to learn more about studying in Europe.

"I really want to go to Europe because of all the history," Bowman said. "I've always been interested in that."

Liz Ward, director of study abroad programs, said the idea of the fair is to reach students like Bowman.

"The fair is an opportunity for students and faculty to come and learn about the kinds of programs students can go on," Ward said. "We just brought it all together in one place."

MEXICO GAS LINE BLASTS FORCE MAJOR FACTORIES TO CLOSE

VERACRUZ, Mexico — One of Mexico's largest automotive plants and hundreds of other factories were shut down Tuesday after a series of gas and oil pipeline explosions, apparently caused by a rebel group, left them without fuel.

Volkswagen AG said it suspended production at its sprawling car factory outside the city of Puebla — the company's only North American manufacturing site — on Monday because of a lack of natural gas. Glassmaker Vitro SAB also said it was temporarily closing six plants across central and western Mexico.

Six explosions ripped apart pipelines in eastern Mexico on Monday, rattling financial markets in the U.S. and Mexico. Industry officials estimated losses at $90 million.

It was the second time in three months that a group calling itself the People's Revolutionary Army has claimed pipeline bombings as part of what it has labeled its "prolonged people's war" against "the anti-people government."

BISHOP WHO LED UNDERGROUND CHINESE CHURCH DIES IN CUSTODY

BEIJING — A bishop who led an underground congregation of Roman Catholics and was repeatedly detained in China for his loyalty to the Vatican died in police custody, a monitoring group said Tuesday.

Bishop Han Dingxiang, 71, was cremated within six hours of his death Sunday and buried in a public cemetery with no priests or other faithful present, both groups said.

Han, who had been under house arrest or other forms of detention for nearly eight years, died while being treated for an unspecified illness, the U.S.-based Cardinal Kung Foundation said.

The group, which has long had close contacts with China's underground church members, did not cite sources for its information.

TIME MAGAZINE TO FIGHT
$106M DEFAMATION
RULING IN INDONESIA

JAKARTA, Indonesia — Time magazine will fight an Indonesia court order to pay $106 million for defaming Suharto by alleging the former dictator's family amassed billions of dollars during his 32-year rule, a lawyer said Tuesday.

Todung Mulya Lubis called the Aug. 31 decision "a serious blow" to press freedom and a setback for Indonesia's judiciary.

The magazine said the May 1999 cover story in its Asian edition was based on four months' reporting in 11 countries research that it said uncovered a complex network of corporate investments, bank transfers and property holdings in Switzerland, Uzbekistan and Nigeria.

"Time magazine will take any legal measures available to defend freedom of the press," Lubis told reporters in the capital, Jakarta.

"We believe it is important to uphold justice and the truth."

The Time article, titled "The Family Firm," alleged that Suharto and his children amassed $73 billion, the bulk of it from oil and mining, forestry, property, banking and petrochemicals. It says the family lost much of the money during the 1997-98 Asian financial crisis.

Group travels to Japan to perform dance

By Mark Wampler
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Seeing 10,000 men and women dance in unison would be an experience in itself, but this summer in Japan, members of the K-State Japanese Yosakoi Dance Team topped that.

They were not watching — they were performing.

In June, most of the 40 members of the Yosakoi dance team traveled to Japan to join other dancers in the Japanese Yosakoi Festival, said Seiji Ikeda, director of the dance team.

The team was featured in a television documentary that appeared on Japan's national television station, Ikeda said, and it also appeared in newspapers, a magazine and a Web site.

"We were well received by the Japanese community in Sapporo, Hokkaido, where the festival took place," he said.

The group has received national and international exposure from their participation in the festival, Ikeda said.

"The K-State Yosakoi club has been regarded as the best college group in the USA," he said.

Cami Riblett, team president and sophomore in family and consumer sciences, said the performance was an overwhelming experience.

"Just being on that big stage performing in front of so many people and dancing in a parade with 10,000 university students was a reward in itself," she said.

"Definitely all of our hard work paid off at that moment."

Riblett said the group explored parts of Japan on the trip, but she said the mass dance was the highlight.

"It was great to do something that you love and enjoy with other people who feel the same way," she said.

The Yosakoi dance is a form of festival dancing that originated in Kochi, Japan, after World War II as a way to give encouragement to its citizens in a post-war depression, Ikeda said.

The dance imitates traditional dancing forms, but is set to modern music and is upbeat. The art form represents many factions of Japanese culture, according to the team's Web site.

Since it was created in 1954, the dance has become a popular cultural event throughout Japanese sporting events and festivals. In 2005, there were 200 scheduled Yosakoi dancing locations for competitions and festivals, according to the site.

Yui Nishita, assistant director of the dance group and a native of Japan, said Yosakoi was invented by a group of Japanese fishermen who hoped that the dance would attract fish. It also motivated them in their work.

"We, the Japanese people, often create some kind of dance when we wish for something," she said. "The dance represents the Japanese people's spirit."

Nishita said it was great to see the reaction of the Japanese people when they found out their group was from the United States.

"The people who watched our performance were amazed that other people in the world know about the Yosakoi dance, and that they love it as much as the native people do," she said.

Nishita said, for her, the dance is spiritual.

"I can feel old Japanese people's spirit while I dance," she said. "I just love it."

Riblett said now the group reflects on their commitment to the dance that allowed them to go abroad to an international festival.

"I tell my friends that I loved every single minute of the trip, and it is honestly the truth," she said. "The members that went on the Japan trip now know what Yosakoi truly means and have the satisfaction of knowing how hard everyone worked to get us to that level."

HOW TO BREW BEER

Student continues family's custom of brewing beer

By Owen Praeger
as told to Eric Davis
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

For the Praeger family, home brewing is more than a hobby — it's a family tradition. The members of the Praeger family have brewed beer for more than 25 years and enjoy the quality of the beer they produce.

Instead of taking that trip to the liquor store to buy the same old batch of beer, students can learn to brew their own home-made beer.

HISTORY OF HOME BREWING

All those who brew their own beer have President Jimmy Carter to thank for that freedom. Until the year 1978, home brewing was outlawed as a holdover from the Prohibition. That same year, Congress passed a bill that allowed brewing in small quantities, and later in the year, President Carter signed the bill making it a law.

Materials for brewing can be purchased online and should not cost more than $100 for all the necessary components. The necessary equipment is very durable and will not wear out for a long period of time.

MY FIRST TIME

The first batch of beer I helped make turned out better than expected. I had a little taste and thought I wouldn't like it, but I was surprised by how delicious it actually was.

I enjoy brewing beer, but I have never met anyone else who brews their own. The taste of the beer is not for everyone. I would not recommend it to anyone who likes light beer. Most light beer has stuff taken out of it, and we don't think that is a very good idea.

-Owen Praeger

The process can be broken down into three phases: cleaning, cooking and bottling.

CLEANING

According to homebrewheaven.com, the necessary equipment for a beginner kit includes a six-gallon primary fermenter, a five-gallon glass jug, an airlock and stopper, a siphon hose, a racking cane and clip, a bottle filler, a two-handled capper, caps, and brushes to clean the bottles and jugs.

The most important thing in home brewing is that the equipment used has to be very clean or the entire batch of beer will be ruined. Dish soap will work just fine.

Wash the equipment to prevent contamination in the brewing process.

COOKING

The second part of the process — cooking the beer — takes a little longer than cleaning.

Mix the hops, malt grains and extracts, and boil them in water. Next, add the flavoring hops and then the finishing hops.

Afterward, use a sink full of cold water to cool the liquid to about 70 degrees.

After the beer has been cooled, add yeast and pour the liquid into a five-gallon fermenting jug. The airlock, a device that keeps air out of the fermenter, will bubble until the fermentation is complete. Once the airlock stops bubbling, it is time to bottle the liquid.

BOTTLING

The final step in the process is the bottling stage, which takes 7-10 days to complete.

Take the beer from the fermenter, and add priming sugar. Then put the beer into bottles.

In the bottles, the beer carbonates, so the beer will not taste flat.

In all our years of home brewing, my family has not made many changes to these steps, only changes that made the process easier to complete. Home brewing is just like anything else — the more you do it, the better you get.

Cool the contents of the brew-pot, called a wort, by submerging it in a sink full of ice water.

Transfer the wort into a five-gallon fermenting vessel.

Place the airlock on the fermenter. Place it in a cool place and wait 10-14 days.

Siphon the fermented beer from the fermenting vessel into the brew-pot.

Stir bottling sugar into beer, and siphon the beer from the brew-pot.

Use the bottle capper to bottle the beer. After 7-10 days, carbonation will be complete.

Remake the best one yet

"Halloween"

Movie review by Brendan Praeger

It has been a long time since a new chapter in the "Halloween" franchise actually piqued the interest of horror fans. Director Rob Zombie's remake of John Carpenter's 1978 classic will please fans of the genre, but it won't convert any nonbelievers.

The first question to be answered when any remake hits theaters is whether or not the film is better than the original. As in most cases, this one is not.

Almost 30 years after its original release, "Halloween" is still a classic. The first scene alone, a point of view shot of a 10-year-old Michael Myers stalking and killing his sister, is more entertaining than the majority of modern horror flicks.

I still remember watching the original at a sleepover in grade school. Of course, back then, seeing a naked baby sitter for seven seconds was enough to make any film a classic. But despite my original reasons for liking the film, it still holds up today as an iconic slasher film.

Rob Zombie had his work cut out for him, and for the most part, he succeeds.

Zombie's first film, "House of 1,000 Corpses," demonstrated his genuine love for classic horror films. It also revealed his lack of directorial experience. His vastly superior follow up, "The Devil's Rejects," succeeded by putting the audience in the serial killer's corner.

Zombie's "Halloween" takes the same approach. Before the killing starts, you can't help but feel sorry for Myers. His father figure is an abusive drunk, and he gets bullied at school because his mom is a stripper. When Myers begins killing, we want him to get revenge.

The first half of the film is more of a prequel than a remake, and it works remarkably well. Zombie actually gives Michael Myers motivation for his first murders, something missing from the previous chapters.

The second half of the film picks up 15 years later. Myers escapes from his cell in a mental institution, killing a few friendly characters in the process. Suddenly, Myers is the soulless character we have all seen before.

Myers returns to his hometown to kill his little sister, now a teenager with absolutely no idea of her family's past.

While the first half of the film steers away from horror conventions, the second half tears through the typical slasher checklist. Every character that has sex, makes popcorn while baby-sitting or decides that a dark, abandoned house couldn't possibly be dangerous meets a gruesome end.

Slasher fans will eat it up. The rest of us will roll our eyes, and anyone with a weak stomach would be better off renting "Ernest Scared Stupid" for their Halloween thrills.

Zombie's remake is no masterpiece, but it is the best Halloween film since the original. It is also one of the better horror remakes of the past few years.

LOS ANGELES — Vanessa Hudgens, the star of the wholesome, made-for-kids TV movie hit "High School Musical," apologized Friday for a nude photo of her on the Web and Walt Disney Co. said it was sticking by the performer.

Some parents of her young fans voiced dismay over the photo, which shows Hudgens, 18, smiling and standing naked directly in front of the camera.

"I want to apologize to my fans, whose support and trust means the world to me," Hudgens said.

"I am embarrassed over this situation and regret having ever taken these photos. I am thankful for the support of my family and friends."

In a statement, Disney said it hoped Hudgens had learned a valuable lesson. "Vanessa has apologized for what was obviously a lapse in judgment."

A Disney representative said the photo would not affect its decision to cast Hudgens in the third film of the "High School Musical" franchise and negotiations for the cast and creative team were continuing.

Earlier Friday, a representative for Hudgens confirmed the image was of Hudgens but said it "was taken privately."

"It is a personal matter and it is unfortunate that this has become public," the representative said in a statement.

Hudgens has starred in "High School Musical" and "High School Musical 2" as Gabriella, the sweet, innocent science geek whose romance with athlete Troy, played by Zac Efron, is chronicled in the two hugely popular made-for-television movies on the squeaky-clean Disney Channel.

on the news.

"It has to do with the media and how certain dogs in the media are portrayed," she said. "The media tends to sensationalize these types of dogs, which only reinforces the stereotypes."

She said one reason dogs cannot be assessed according to their breed is that no two dogs are alike, and each dog has its own temperament.

"Some are shy — some are assertive. But more than anything, it all depends on the owner and how the dog is raised," Neer said. "The majority of behavior problems can be rehabilitated."

She said there are several types of aggression in dogs that are not raised in a proper social environment.

"There's a type of aggression from being tied up all day and other types of aggression when a dog is bored or just wanting attention," she said. "It all depends on the owner and the dog."

Rogers' dogs have been certified by the Canine Good Citizen Test that tests animals on behavioral situations like accepting a stranger and sitting politely for petting, she said.

Bean also is certified as an Animal Therapy Dog through the Delta Society. She visits retirement communities around Manhattan and will begin visiting the Manhattan Boys and Girls Club and local elementary schools this fall, Rogers said.

"There are some dogs in this world that are so perceptive on how their human is feeling emotionally — Bean is one of them," she said. "If I am sad, crying or stressed out, she will come very close to me and sit next to me and cuddle until she knows I am feeling better."

Rogers said the only way the dog breeds that are listed as dangerous can make a comeback as good dogs is if the owners take better care of them and socialize them.

"When it comes to people, you should judge by behavior, not the color of their skin. So it is with dogs," Neer said. "Judging a dog by its breed is just like judging a book by its cover."

"It all stems from responsible ownership," she said.

Faculty teams with Riley Co.

By Adrienne Deweese
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Wildcats have the opportunity to unite with Riley County in this year's $1-million goal for the United Way of Riley County Campaign.

The K-State portion of the county-wide campaign — with a theme of "Wildcats United!" — started Wednesday afternoon at the K-State Student Union Ballroom.

Between 700-850 K-State faculty and staff members volunteered their time annually to the campaign.

K-State volunteers raised more than $103,000 in the 2006 campaign, while the countywide campaign raised more than $620,000, said Maxine Coffey, United Way of Riley County executive director.

K-State has contributed to the campaign for at least 20 years.

About five years ago, the university raised about $80,000, Coffey said, but the university raised more than $100,000 in 2003. Its involvement in the county campaign continues to expand, Coffey said.

"We just want to keep that momentum going," she said. "We feel sure that when people become more aware of the needs that exist in the community they'd be willing to contribute to the campaign."

At Iowa State University — a university of comparable size to K-State — faculty and staff volunteers raised more than $750,000 during their United Way campaign last year, said Mark Knackendoffel, The Trust Company of Manhattan president and United Way of Riley County volunteer leader.

"Does that put the bar a little higher?" Knackendoffel said. "Let's go get those Cyclones."

Each year, Coffey said United Way partner agencies apply for funding in a process similar to applying for grants. Because of Manhattan community growth and other need-based factors, Coffey said the campaign total goal was set at $1 million. The United Way Community Campaign starts Monday, and it ends Oct. 31.

"(The 15 agencies) are very frugal in their requests," Coffey said. "We know they could use more money than they receive."

If everyone in Riley County who contributed to the 2006 campaign contributed an additional 25 cents each day, the $1 million goal would be reached, Coffey said.

Established in 1944, the United Way of Riley County's 15 agencies directly served more than 29,000 Manhattan and Riley County individuals in 2006. Ninety-nine cents of every dollar raised through United Way stays in the community, while a nominal membership fee is paid to the United Way of America for use of a copyright logo and numerous training resources, according to the K-State campaign volunteer guide.

Stephanie Jacques, assistant to the director of the Division of Biology, is a first-year volunteer in K-State's United Way Campaign. She said she plans to hang posters, wear her campaign T-shirt and send e-mails across the Division of Biology list-serv to educate department members about the campaign.

"Since I work in the main office, many people come in, and I can get them to ask questions," Jacques said. "Once they ask questions, I can provide them with information."

The United Way Campaign unites the university with the Manhattan community, and it allows volunteers to feel good about themselves through their contributions, Jacques said.

"We've all felt at some point in our lives we've needed a helping hand, whether it was physical, emotional or financial," she said. "Why not give back in return?"

TOP: Patrick Livingston, owner of Pat's Pawn and Gun in Ogden, Kan., filled his store of ammunition before Sept. 1 when the prices increased by 15 percent. Livingston said the increase in ammunition is because of the large amounts of rounds being fired by troops in Iraq and Afghanistan. War causes shortage of bullets to police, hunters

By Mike Kelly
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Troops training for and fighting in Iraq and Afghanistan are firing more than one billion bullets per year, contributing to a worsening ammunition shortage affecting police departments and sportsmen nationwide, according to a new study.

According to a review by the Associated Press, dozens of police and sheriff's departments are experiencing ammunition delays of almost a year. Ammunition prices are increasing to almost twice the almost they paid last year.

Some police departments nationwide have changed their training regiments as a result of the shortage, according to the review. Forgoing this proper training comes with a price, police said.

"Practice makes perfect," said Lt. Kurt Moldrup, spokesman for the Riley County Police Department. "If we didn't believe in training, we wouldn't do it. In real-world situations, you revert to what you were trained to do."

Luckily for the RCPD, the shortage has not directly affected the training regiment.

In fact, ammunition usage at the RCPD during training is up from last year. Training officer Josh Kyle said new officers and additional training drills and classes all have contributed to the rise.

"As a result, our ammo usage is up, but that's a good thing, because it means we train a higher quality officer," he said.

Kyle said the RCPD goes through roughly 50,000 handgun rounds per year during training. He said that because of a state contract, ammunition prices are locked for the year in January.

Other police departments are not as lucky.

In Oklahoma City, officers can no longer qualify with AR-15 rifles because the department does not have enough .223-caliber ammunition, The Associated Press reported. The .223 is similar to that fired by the military's M-16 and M-4 rifles. Last fall, an ammunition shortage forced the department to cancel qualification courses for several different guns.

The Associated Press survey blamed the shortage on the skyrocketing demand for ammunition, which began after the war began in Afghanistan. Coupled with military training needs, police changing their own practices following the Sept. 11th attacks, and the increased demand for copper and lead overseas, the demand for ammunition is exponentially increasing.

"Since 9/11, we've seen a huge jump in demand from law enforcement," said Brain Grace, External Communications Specialist for Alliant Techsystems Inc. "In the last fiscal year alone we saw demand from law enforcement jump 40 percent. By running our civil plants 24/7, hiring hundreds of new employees and streamlining our manufacturing processes, we were able to increase our deliveries to law enforcement by 30 percent in that same period."

"In addition, we've just announced we'll be investing another million (dollars) in new production lines at our civil ammunition facilities."

The military is not in danger of an ammunition shortage, as it receives the majority of its ammunition from a plant just outside Kansas City. The Lake City Army Ammunition Plant in Independence, Mo., directly supplies the military with more than 80 percent of its small-arms ammunition. Production at the factory has more than tripled since 2002, rising from roughly 425 million rounds that year to 1.4 billion rounds in 2006, according to the Joint Munitions Command at the Rock Island Arsenal in Illinois.

K-State Online receives helpful changes for instructors, new layout

By Jacques Haag
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

They've been working on it for a year, it's been out for more than a month, and K-State students are probably just now taking notice.

The most recent version of K-State Online was released Aug. 6, and its updates are three fold, said Scott Finkeldei, associate director of Mediated Education.

The organizer on the Web site was improved to make it easier for students and instructors to use. Also, new tools will make it easier for instructors to manage their courses, and K-State was introduced to the single sign-on system, Finkeldei said.

He said the goal was to make it easier for students to navigate the site and specifically for new instructors to figure out how to use the site right away.

The single sign-on system allows students to access K-State Online and their ePortfolio by signing on just once through the K-State Connection portal on www.ksu.edu, Finkeldei said.

"K-State Online is one of the things you can single sign-on into," he said. "You sign onto one thing, and you can sign into other things."

He said WebMail will be the next addition to the single sign-on process.

Along with the three main changes made to K-State Online, Finkeldei said several new tools also were added.

There is a voice-recording tool for students, and they can make a voice recording and upload it to their instructors in file drop box on the site. He said this could be useful for students in language courses; for example, students in a Spanish 500-level course might have an assignment to read a paragraph so the instructor could check their pronunciation.

Laura Kanost, visiting assistant professor in Spanish, said the students in her advanced conversation class do weekly journals, and she is giving them the option of using the voice-recording tool on K-State Online.

"I think it would be very neat," Kanost said. "I have to figure out how to use it still, but I think it could be very useful if (students) want to practice their oral communication skills."

Finkeldei said the possibilities for this tool are endless, as students could use it to make proposals for presentations or projects, students in veterinary medicine could practice pronouncing medical terms and many other uses.

This year's release did not change the students' view of K-State Online drastically, he said, and he said he hopes next year's release will change the student interface to make it look more modern.

Each year, instructors and students submit requests for changes to be made to K-State Online, Finkeldei said, and he and others in the Office of Mediated Education review the list and evaluate what changes will be most helpful to the most people and how feasible they are to make.

"It's a year-long process," he said. "We started last week planning for the next release next summer. What we started doing last week was looking at this list — it's four pages long — of all the requests we got last year, and we started evaluating this list of what we can do this year."

"We release (a new version of K-State Online) every August, and then we start immediately at the end of August planning for the next August."

Teaching Hospital offers pick-up services for pets in remote areas

By Monica Castro
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

For some pets in Kansas and Nebraska that need care, K-State Veterinary Services will travel to them.

K-State's Veterinary Medicine Teaching Hospital provides transportation for pets that require medical treatment through its Wildcat Express Transportation Service.

The service started in January 1998 to help pets from various Kansas and Nebraska cities receive medical service.

Hospital Administrator Shirley Arck said the service was started in effort to reach out and make the veterinary hospital available to people in rural areas.

The service makes trips to several locations in Kansas and Nebraska. Arck also said the trip to Kansas or Nebraska cities costs $90, but clients who need transportation service outside Kansas and Nebraska are charged based on the mileage to the city.

The trip fee does not include the medical costs and procedures, which vary depending on the diagnosis, she said.

Wildcat Express makes the trip to Wichita on Tuesdays and Nebraska on Thursdays, Arck said. She also said if clients are in need of pet treatment, special trips to different locations also are arranged.

Both veterinarians and veterinary medicine students treat a variety of pets, including dogs and cats. Arck said the students receive hands-on training while assisting the veterinarians.

"It is a great service, because it helps students see cases they may not have seen before, and it offers care for patients," Arck said.

To have an animal picked up and transported to the teaching hospital, owners should contact their local veterinary clinic, said Patrice Scott, College of Veterinary Medicine marketing coordinator.

The veterinary clinic will call the teaching hospital and arrange a pick-up time.

The animal is then picked up and taken to the hospital for treatment, and after the procedures are complete, there is a recovery time before the animal is released. When the animal is ready to leave, the veterinary hospital will contact the patients' veterinarian and will make travel arrangements and set a pick-up time, Patrice said.

Stephanie Humphrey, Little Apple Veterinary Clinic nurse, said the service is good for people who live far away from Manhattan, who might not have local veterinarians.

Humphrey said she thought it was a good service, because there are a lot of out-of-town clients who need their pets treated somewhere.

"If there is ever something major, like surgery or specialty care, we send them to Kansas State," Humphrey said.

Wildcat Express driver

Mark Scott said he has driven for six years and enjoys it.

Mark Scott also is an animal-science technician for the teaching hospital. His main duty as an animal science technician is driving the Wildcat Express, but when he is not on the road, he helps out in the hospital wherever he is needed, he said.

Mark Scott said Wildcat Express usually takes several animals a week to Wichita and Nebraska.

During the last nine years, the service has fluctuated on the number of patients it transports throughout the year, Scott said. He also said when people realize the Wildcat Express is available for their use they appreciate and utilize it.

"I get a satisfaction from driving Wildcat Express because, I am sometimes lucky enough to see owners reunited with their pets when I return them to their veterinary clinic," he said.

The bus uses a generator for climate control to keep the animals comfortable, Mark Scott said. On the inside, there are four big kennels on the bottom tier and eight smaller kennels on the top tier for smaller animals.

Mark Scott said it gives him a good feeling to know he helped an animal that might not have been able to receive care without the Wildcat Express' services.

"I am not a veterinarian, but it's nice to have a part in so many success stories," Scott said.

Site first created for distance courses

By Jacque Haag
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State Online was not supposed to be for everybody.

When the Web site was created 10 years ago, its purpose was to help instructors of distance courses interact better with their students, said Scott Finkeldei, associate director of the Office of Mediated Education.

"The origin of K-State Online was that the Division of Continuing Education was of course doing distance courses for years and years before this by mail and video tape and other things, and the Web was becoming very popular by '97," he said. "They came to us and said, 'Wouldn't it be neat if instructors could put these documents on the Web?'"

The Office of Mediated Education went to work putting chat rooms and message boards online for easier and faster communication among instructors and students.

"Originally, it was a need-based thing," Finkeldei said. "People came to us and said, 'We need a way to easily put stuff on the Internet, and we recognize that, and none of us know (how to do) that.'"

"Back then it really did involve someone with computer-science skills to build a Web page."

He said it quickly became obvious the site could be useful on campus as well, and the K-State Online team worked with faculty, department heads and administrators to learn what online tools could make teaching and learning easier.

"We put (distance-education) tools up in 1997, and in 1998, it really became K-State Online," Finkeldei said.

Each year since 1997, the Office of Mediated Education has worked to improve K-State Online by updating it with more tools, making site navigation easier and improving the site's appearance.

There is at least one update each year, Finkeldei said, and for the first five years, there often were two updates each year.

The team spends six to seven months planning each new release of K-State Online and an additional six to seven months building and polishing the release, he said.

"It really is a constant thing that we are always working on," Finkeldei said. "It used to be - 7 or 8 years ago - that there were actual downtimes when nothing was going on, but the reality is that there isn't anymore at K-State."

Because of summer courses and intercessions, there is not a time when classes are not in session.

"Classes are going on 365 days a year," Finkeldei said. "It used to be that we could develop K-State Online and sort of have logical breaks in there, but now classes are going on 365 days a year."

Though the site became a full-time job for the Office of Mediated Education, Finkeldei said he thinks it has become a place for seamless interaction between instructors and students, whether they are on campus, in a coffee shop across the street or in Iraq.

"I think the biggest changes that we've made over the last couple of years is adding true 'interact-ability,'" he said.

Breadbasket receives $5,000 grant

By Monica Castro
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

For the second consecutive year, the Flint Hills Breadbasket received a $5,000 grant from U.S. Cellular for its work helping local disadvantaged families.

"We are so excited to be receiving this grant for the second year in a row for the holiday food basket distribution," said Flint Hills Breadbasket Executive Director Natascha Phillip.

She said the grant will go to purchase perishable food items like meat, and fresh fruit and vegetables for families that are living below the poverty line during the holiday season.

"U.S. Cellular has been a tremendous supporter of the Breadbasket, and it is nice to have a business giving back to the community," Phillip said.

Last year, after receiving the grant, the Breadbasket - a nonprofit organization - distributed 2,000 food baskets to families.

"The U.S. Cellular charitable giving organization was implemented to help focus on serving economically disadvantaged youth, families and seniors," said Kim Furlow, public relations counsel for U.S. Cellular.

She said this program focuses on helping provide people with opportunities for a better life.

"Last year we had to purchase a lot of turkeys and other food," Furlow said. "This year we will be doing the same by replenishing the food for the baskets given during the holiday season."

She said organizations are required to apply for the grant online, and then a committee chooses which organization will get the money.

Robert Winger, U.S. Cellular's director of sales in Manhattan, said organizations are eligible for a grant if they provide services to disadvantaged families and if they are located within the coverage area the company services. Also, the organizations have to be non-politically orientated and nondiscriminatory.

The U.S. Cellular program has made charitable contributions to organizations like the breadbasket for several years, Winger said.

"I feel really honored that we can provide and help people out," Winger said.

A Hollywood hopeful

Voters should investigate celebrity candidate's past

In true Hollywood style, Fred Thompson announced last Wednesday he officially is running for president. He promises to return the Republican Party to better times, which, considering the state of affairs they are in, is a fairly manageable goal. Perhaps, he is the only one who can.

KEVIN PHILLIPS

Before the man officially wasn't running for president he polled in the top three, demonstrating just how strong the running republicans are in the race.

After months of holding out, Fred Thompson now has a considerable amount of hype to live up to. According to the New York Times on Sept. 7, Thompson's goal is to become the second coming of Reagan, a task not so easily manageable.

Given his popularity, and now his prospects for being a serious contender on the presidential stage, we must ask the following question. How much do we know about this former senator, actor and lobbyist who waited until the primaries were four months away to announce his campaign?

He has of course been a part of the discussion for months, but it isn't until candidates actually step out into the presidential war zone that their pasts start to catch up to them. Before we get to his past, let's start with his present.

Thus far, his platform seems extremely simple; The Washington Post candidate profile for Thompson said he is trying to appeal to those in the GOP base who are not comfortable with current Republican frontrunners. The 65-year-old Thompson continues to be the candidate who stays as close to basic Republican values as he can.

He has wasted no time in making subtle political jabs at his fellow Republican candidates for any slides to the middle and not-so-subtle stabs at Democrat candidates.

He already has made several references to his career in the Senate and the endless battle against former President Bill Clinton. He refers to Hillary Clinton as the "Other Clinton," and he won't allow another Clinton to take the White House.

Thompson is a celebrity. Celebrities are cool and — I'm guessing — fun to hang out with. The problem remains that in 2000, the country picked the candidate they wanted to have a beer with, and we all are still dealing with that tragic decision.

Before he is anointed Reagan 2, it is important to note Fred Thompson's extremely sketchy background.

One main difference between the two is Reagan's 30 years worth of work in conservative politics versus Thompson's zero.

National Public Radio's "All Things Considered" on Sept. 5 reported some of the many issues Fred Thompson must overcome. These issues include lobbying for a group seeking to relax restriction on abortion in 1994, his inconsistent voting record in the areas of affirmative action and campaign finance reform.

My fear is people aren't taking the time to delve into Thompson's past.

After the Virginia Tech shootings he made the comment that if conceal and carry was legal, then the shooting would never have occurred, yet as a senator, he voted to make carrying a weapon on school grounds a federal crime.

Let's all give him the history lashing he deserves before the booths open in four months.

Moral values should have no place in political decisions

As another presidential election draws near, U.S. citizens everywhere tune into national debates, read news articles and rely on hearsay to decide which candidate they will have voted for when they walk out with their "I Voted" sticker.

MEGAN MOLITOR

Citizens choose their candidate based on who they believe has views closest to their own.

In a perfect world, not only would politicians be truthful, but those who vote would make wise decisions.

The problem with beliefs are just that: they are beliefs. Citizens tend to choose their stance on an issue based on their personal feelings.

Unfortunately, this is done by mixing in one's morals and values, which are out of place in a political decision.

Political decisions need to be based on what is best for the country and what is constitutionally acceptable, not what one holds to be morally sound.

Republican presidential candidate Rudy Giuliani takes this approach with his stance concerning abortion.

During the last Republican presidential debate, when pressed about his stance on abortion, he said, while he "hated abortion" he does not believe it should be outlawed.

In a much criticized statement, he said "ultimately, since it is an issue of conscience, I would respect a woman's right to make a different choice ... you have to respect a woman's right to make that choice differently than my conscience."

Many individuals brushed off the statement, saying they thought he was taking two positions on abortion.

This is not a case of two positions but rather a case of knowing how to separate personal beliefs from political ones.

According to MSNBC, out of all 10 contenders at the debate, Giuliani was the only one who said he didn't think repealing Roe vs. Wade would make things right.

Whether it's a good political move for him to take this controversial stance, the point is that even though Giuliani is against the concept of abortion, he's smart enough to know other people do not hold this same belief.

Using more than moral beliefs to make political decisions allows people to better defend their positions with a logical approach, backed up by facts.

Save decisions of morality and religion for your personal life. They are immensely important, perhaps even more than political ones, but decisions based on one's moral code of life have no place in the political world.

When it comes to taking a stance, remember Rudy Giuliani. He believes what he believes, but knows the rest of the country is capable of deciding for themselves.

Outlawing acts or ideas considered to be morally "wrong" and should never be the last word in politics.

Megan Molitor is a senior in print journalism. Please send comments to opinion@pub.ksu.edu.

TO THE EDITOR

Readers have mixed responses to immigration column

Editor,

Nice article, and good job. Not only do illegal immigrants bring diseases into our country, there is a liberal agenda for the illegal minority vote as well as middle-Americans having to subsidize these people at the expense of big businesses exploiting them for profit. They do not want to learn English or adapt to American culture, and they expect us to cater to their needs. This hurts No Child Left Behind because we leave all children behind at the expense of promoting a subgroup.

The liberals ran that education policy, underfunding the Individuals With Disabilities Education Act with to promote minorities in education. This discovery is huge. Hillary Clinton, Barack Obama and Ed Kennedy all served on that board, and these people didn't do their jobs on that education workforce committee. It wasn't Bush that shorted special-education children. The injustice is groups like La Raza, ("The Race"), are backed by unions. How's that for democracy?

Where else are you going to break the law and get rewarded for doing so? We even encouraged them, as ACLU and liberal lawyers sue our government for rights for those who are here illegally. This is a huge liability, and we need to address this and get it on the agenda before the next election. A misconception is that Republicans aren't for education or environment. What happens to our environment because of an open border? What about population control? There is no regulation on population control without our laws being upheld. What happens to our environment when states subsidize babies born to illegal immigrants? We can't kick children out of the country if they are born here. This is dead weight in our economy; having an open border with no solution insight, as amnesty is a Band-Aid.

We have enough problems without inviting more trouble to come here illegally. I'm Hispanic, but please don't speak for me. Is a group of legal minorities speaking out about immigration reform? A common stereotype is this lack of amnesty is discrimination against minorities. I really don't think so. Liberals also want us to believe this is a civil-rights issue. It clearly is not. It's an issue about morality and people clearly are breaking the laws and getting away with it because they are illegal immigrants.

We need to penalize employers for hiring illegal immigrants and promote the use of real identification. I hope you get out and encourage your peers, whether they are Democrat or Republican. We all need to understand the importance of immigration reform. The global effects are huge — look at California and even Oregon. This Mexican illegal immigration group is the fastest-growing minority on the West Coast but we have no regulation for who comes here, and that's not good.

Editor,

Brigitte Brecheisen's entire column — from the title "Immigrants Bring Diseases into States" — to the insulting graphic that accompanied it, was a disgrace to the growing Hispanic/Latino student and faculty population at K-State.

I recently have moved back to Kansas from the Dallas — Fort Worth Metroplex to take a position here at K-State, and I am shocked and disappointed with the ignorance and lack of tact exhibited by our campus newspaper. The Hispanic/Latino student and faculty organizations will address this serious issue with campus administration.

When President Jon Wefald arrived at K-State, enrollment was on the decline and the football team was in the middle of a massive losing streak. Wefald said the key to K-State's turnaround was hiring the right people and empowering them to make decisions.

Wefald turns university enrollment, sports around

The "Wildcat Archives" series will take a look back at a different K-Stater every week who was part of an important time in Wildcat sports history.

By Jonathan Garten
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

When President Jon Wefald arrived in Manhattan in 1986, the K-State football team was more of a punchline than a powerhouse.

In those days, the Wildcats couldn't even beat North Texas State, Northern Iowa or Austin Peay State. They couldn't beat anyone. K-State was in the middle of a losing streak that would stretch from 1986 all the way to the 1989 season.

In 1985, the Wildcats lost to Wichita State, 16-10. The next year, the Shockers got rid of their football program.

"The football team couldn't win a game," Wefald said. "I mean literally could not win a game."

But the football team, which was broke and dependent on loans just to stay afloat, wasn't the only thing in poor shape. Enrollment was steadily declining and had dipped to a mere 13,000 students. Funding for research was down to $18 million.

With all the problems, people might have wondered why Wefald would ever take the job at K-State. After all, he was the chancellor of Minnesota's state university system.

"I saw, not problems, but an opportunity," Wefald said. "And I saw hope. In other words if we could get everyone on the same page, academically, administratively and athletically, that we could do the impossible on all fronts."

Wefald said his first priority was to rebuild his administrative staff. He said the previous leadership had thought the university should let enrollment continue to drop and level off at 11,000.

One of Wefald's new hires, Vice President of Institutional Advancement Pat Bosco, was key to meeting Wefald's second priority of reversing the declining enrollment.

"I ran into Pat Bosco the first week I was here, and quite frankly at that time he was on third team," Wefald said. "I think he was on the third team because he was so good. And I saw that and hired him as our head of enrollments, and in two years our enrollment is up to 19,000 and now we're at 23,000."

After Wefald surrounded himself with the right administration, he focused on turning the football team around. With a losing team and funding and facilities comparable to big-time high school programs, Wefald said many people thought K-State should have followed Wichita State's example and ditched football.

Not Wefald. He let anyone who would listen know that K-State was going to be competitive in football. He even told legendary Oklahoma football coach Barry Switzer during a 1986 Orange Bowl cocktail party.

"I just told him, 'Hi, I'm the new president at K-State, and I can't wait until we're able to take our team down to the Orange Bowl like this,'" Wefald said. "He just smiled but didn't really say anything."

The truth was Switzer was laughing at the comment behind Wefald's back. There was no way in Switzer's mind that K-State would ever be on the level of the nation's elite.

Switzer would later be forced to eat his words mainly because Wefald hired Bill Snyder in 1988. After a rough start in 1989, Snyder's teams began a steady improvement that mirrored the improvement of the university as a whole.

In 1993, Wefald finally was able to take his own team to a bowl game. It wasn't the Orange Bowl, but Wefald said the 1993 Copper Bowl was a signature moment in Wildcat history.

"There was nothing like going to that first Copper Bowl," Wefald said. "That was the thrill of a lifetime. That was the beginning of the Snyder era."

Today, K-State's enrollment is up, funding for research has increased to more than $100 million a year, and no one is considering disbanding the football team out of sheer embarrassment.

"It's all about hope," Wefald said. "It's all about vision. It's all about getting people to dream big dreams and to work hard and to get better every day."

Fans need feel-good stories

The grass was slightly wet, and the dirt was pushed into the ground from an entire day of games.

As I stepped onto the mound, I picked up the baseball for the first time as a pitcher.

That day, I got the game ball, even though I gave up two hits and a run.

Nothing could have ruined that day.

I still have that ball; it sits on my dresser back in my hometown. I even wrote "Ace Relief Pitcher" on the white leather cowhide.

In reality, I was far from this, but to my parents and myself, I was a pitcher that day.

Sports are one of the simplest forms of entertainment.

You hit the ball with a bat, toss it through a hoop or catch it for a touchdown. But when you look at the big picture, sports are far from simple.

Nowadays, people's lives depend on sports. Fans are living and dying with every play and every recruitment battle their team wins or losses. We pay professional athletes millions of dollars to play games.

The sad part is that we're all part of it.

Sports are present in all of our lives, even if you don't enjoy them. It fuels a lot of entertainment business and gives us stories of honor and cowardliness.

Our perceptions have been skewed by cases like Michael Vick's, to the point that Rick Ankiel's alleged use of human growth hormone seems like a feel-good story. Even the almighty New England Patriots have been accused of cheating.

Where are the feel-good stories of sports?

Reporters are supposed to report both sides of the news, but it seems there isn't enough of that going on right now.

In the meantime, if you find yourself sick of listening to Terrell Owens talk or Chad Johnson proclaiming himself part of the Hall of Fame, look into your own past for some good memories to remind you how great sports can be, like playing pick-up games with the neighborhood kids or the sound of a swish on a game winning shot.

I have an array of memories that keep sports alive in my heart.

The best memory I have is going to the "Field of Dreams" and playing catch with my grandfather, a former minor-league baseball player.

He was throwing knuckle balls to my brother and me and talking about the good old days. It was pure and remains ingrained into my memory.

Other memories include tossing the ball with my father or brother in the front yard or running during a cross-country race while my mom encouraged me and my dad and waved.

I love the simplicity and innocence of those memories.

Sports are a powerful commodity.

They caused peace during the last World Cup on the Ivory Coast.

They cause riots in Europe during soccer matches. They polarize our emotions.

Hopefully, soon we won't have to rely on our own memories to find out how great sports can be, and negative news can be as sparse as the good news is today.

No. 19-ranked volleyball team extends streak, sweeps Kansas at Lawrence on Wednesday

STAFF REPORT

The No. 19 Wildcats (9-2) extended their win streak Wednesday to 12-straight games, sweeping Kansas 3-0 (30-20, 30-21, 30-25) at the Horejsi Center in Lawrence.

Middle blockers Kelsey Chipman and Megan Farr led the Wildcats in kills with 14 and 13, respectively.

The duos also led the Wildcats in hitting percentage, with Farr posting a mark of .480 and Chipman hitting .414.

The Wildcats' usual kill leaders, Nataly Korobkova and Rita Liliom, converted nine each.

Korobkova utilized her jump serve to record a team-high four aces against the Jayhawks.

Also recording aces were seniors Stacey Spiegelberg and Angie Lastra and junior Jenny Jantsch, who all finished with one.

Senior libero Lauren Rosenthal also recorded double-digit digs, finishing the match with 10.

After winning the first game, K-State fell behind 10-3 in game two.

But the Wildcats fought back, tying the game at 21 on a kill by Liliom.

The Wildcats finished the game on a 12-0 run and won 30-21.

K-State closed out the match with a 30-25 win in game three, punctuated by kills from Chipman and Farr.

K-State ended the Jayhawks' five-match win streak and dropped Kansas to 0-1 in conference play.

The Wildcats are now 8-4 in Big 12 Conference openers.

The Wildcats' home opener will be Saturday against the Baylor Bears (7-4) at Ahearn Field House. Action is scheduled to start at 1 p.m.

Christopher Hanewinkel | COLLEGIAN

Lauren Rosenthal goes for a bump during the Varney's Kansas State Invitational last weekend. The Wildcats beat KU 3-0 Wednesday night at Lawrence.

Prince announces new location for K-State's pregame entrance

The K-State football team's Wildcat Walk will take place on the east side of Snyder Family Stadium before Saturday's game against Missouri State.

Previously, players entered through the west side of the stadium. The move will allow fans on the east side — including the large contingent of students — to take part.

K-State players and coaches will arrive at the stadium at approximately 3:50 p.m. at Gate 8 on Kimball Avenue. The team will make its way to the stadium through the parking lot on foot, entering the facility between Gates T and V on the east concourse.

The program is encouraging fans to participate in the Wildcat Walk throughout the season by lining a path to the stadium and greeting the players as they arrive.

Red River rivalry leaves Texas fan nearly castrated

To some Oklahoma football fans, there are things that just aren't done in the heart of Sooner Nation, and one of them is walking into a bar wearing a Texas Longhorns T-shirt.

That's what ignited a bloody skirmish that left a Texas-shirt-wearing fan nearly castrated and an Oklahoma fan facing assault charges.

The case has set off a debate about the extreme passions behind a bitter rivalry.

"I've actually heard callers on talk radio say that this guy deserved what he got for wearing a Texas T-shirt into a bar in the middle of Sooner country," said Irvn Box, an Oklahoma attorney.

According to police, 32-year-old Texas fan Brian Christopher Thomas walked into Henry Hudson's Pub on June 17 wearing a Longhorns T-shirt and quickly became the focus of football "trash talk" from 53-year-old Oklahoma fan Allen Michael Beckett.

Thomas told police he decided to leave, and as he went paid his tab, Beckett grabbed him in the crotch, pulled him to the ground and wouldn't let go, even as bar patrons tried to break it up. When the two men were separated, Thomas looked down and realized the extent of his injuries.

"He could see both of his testicles hanging on the outside of his body," said Thomas' attorney, Carl Hughes. "He was wearing a pair of white shorts, which made it that much worse."

ASK THE 5TH YEAR

Don't put up with messes

My roommate never picks up after himself. Can you help?

Throw everything he leaves out into their bedroom. I mean everything. At first, you'll want to start simple: a few clothes, maybe a book bag and some notes. But as it progresses, you'll need to move up to bigger — or rather messier — things and show no remorse.

If your roommate leaves a half-eaten sandwich on the coffee table, throw it in his bedroom. And I mean throw it. Don't just set it in there. Give it a good chuck.

If your roommate enjoys leaving a plate-full of maple syrup and eggs in the sink, don't hesitate to pick that sucker up and toss it on his pillow. Practice your out-routes and fly-patterns with his half-eaten banana or engineering project. Grab his notebook by the pages and shot-put that bad boy on top of the eggs.

Don't stop there. Drinks — those are the real winners. If he likes to leave cups of orange juice, or empty cans of Dr. Thunder around, just close your eyes and do your best Elway impersonation.

Ask my old roommate; falling asleep on a milk-soaked pillow is never fun. Soon your roommate will get the picture, too. Of course, he'll hate you for awhile though.

My roommate comes home drunk making a ton of noise on week nights. What can I do?

Well, first of all, you're going to need another place to sleep. Not permanently by any means, but just one night when she's going out.

The next time your roommate goes out for the night, lock all the doors to your place so she can't get back in. This might require some use of barricades or large amounts of duct tape, depending on whether or not she has a key.

Block the entrances however necessary and then leave. Just leave. Go to your friend's house to sleep.

My roommates did this to me a couple years ago. Of course, it was Halloween, and I was left wandering the streets at 4 a.m. in a Batman costume.

Oddly enough, I was pulled over by a cop that night wondering if I had seen anyone matching some description. Naturally, he thought the Dark Knight could be of some assistance; unfortunately, for him, I was drunk, and he was wrong. I learned my lesson.

Hangovers are no fun! Got any tips?

Day-old bread from Jimmy John's. It's the best 50 cents you ever spend. Get a water, sit down, chill out to some great music and enjoy.

Eat something before you call it a night. It won't always help, but usually it will do the trick.

Stay away from drinks with a high sugar content. Don't even think about jungle juice. Even though it's delicious, it is just a headache waiting to happen. I'd probably have more if it didn't make me feel like a freshman girl trying to fit in.

The bottom line is, hangovers are caused from dehydration, so drink, drink, drink (water).

Student's internship opens doors to new career possibilities

By Patrick Longman
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

This summer, Katie Meadows, graduate student in theater, took a job with a theater that means business.

All advertisements for positions at the Theatre at Monmouth state, "No divas or jackasses need apply."

Meadows took heed of this warning and sought an internship with the company, located in Monmouth, Maine.

"It was really a fluke that I got the position," said Meadows.

She said after waiting for a callback, she called the theater and the producing director answered.

Meadows said she made such a good impression on the director with her credentials, not only did he accept her into the company, he gave her a paid position. Meadows was hired as the administrative and marketing assistant.

Her responsibilities at the theater included general administrative duties, dealing with ticket problems and fundraising.

Meadows has high praise for the Theatre at Monmouth.

"The people that work there love it. They want to come back," she said.

As part of a strategy to break down barriers and encourage cooperation within the company, no one revealed their positions on the first day.

"We all had first names, that was it," Meadows said. "You didn't know if the person standing next to you was an intern in the scene shop or one of the equity actors that had been there for 10 years."

The Theatre at Monmouth is progressive in more than just bonding exercises. Meadows said the season consisted of six shows, all of which were in production at the same time.

"The entire month of August, we were doing 12 shows a week, and each performance was a different show," Meadows said. "We just kept rotating."

The season included children's favorites like "Charlotte's Web," "The Oldest Story Ever Told" (an adaptation of "Cinderella") and two Shakespearean plays.

"Basically the Theatre at Monmouth is the Shakespearean theater of Maine, and that is its main focus during the summer," Meadows said.

Meadows said both the environment and people in Maine and its people impressed her.

"It was a different kind of mentality," Meadows said. "I don't think as many people in Kansas visit the theater, whereas in Maine, it's what they do. It's their entertainment."

Meadows also mentioned that many retired Floridians spend the summer in Maine.

"It was wonderful — laid back," she said. "People were extremely nice. There were actually trees everywhere you looked."

It is this charm and the company's commitment to quality, Meadows said, that draws actors back each year.

"It's this professional theater in this little bit of town we had a general store, a gas station and a bakery-café," she said. "And a professional theater."

Meadows, who is also the associate director of marketing for K-State Theater, said she will consider returning to Monmouth next summer, but might apply for positions at other theaters across the country.

In Monmouth, Meadows said she made many contacts with people who work in various theaters along the East Coast.

"It's given me experience and confidence," she said. "Now I know I can be put into that situation and succeed and thrive."

Meadows said to get a good internship, it is important to send out résumés to any and all summer companies, to make contacts with other theaters and to have good letters of recommendation.

"I recommend that no matter where you work or what you're doing, whether it be in the theater or in the classroom, take pride in what you do and work hard," Meadows said. "I know it sounds cliché, but it really shows. People see that."

Which well-known comic-book super hero are you?

By Eric Davis
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

When pushed into a corner, you:

A. become so angry you get bigger and lose control of yourself. In past outbursts, you've been known to throw tanks over a quarter mile and break city buses clean in two.

B. rely on your brains and the knowledge that eventually good will win the fight.

C. basically use your bare hands to slice the enemy down. You don't care who pissed you off — when you get angry, people die.

D. you retreat into the shadows and use your quasi-ninja training to play upon the fears of your enemy.

E. when you get angry, it's never your fault. Someone pushed you up against a wall and you were forced to use your powers to save the day. What a drag.

When someone squeezes the toothpaste tube from the middle, you:

A. fly into a rage. You have one question: What do you have to break down to get to the culprit?

B. swing down to the corner store and get a new tube. To prevent it from happening again, you encase the new tube in a webs. No more worrying about that.

C. are unperturbed. You usually cut the toothpaste tube wide open when you reach for it. At least you're not the one who made the mess this time.

D. have your butler run to the store for some new paste. You can afford it being the owner of a multi-billion-dollar empire.

E. make a stink in front of anyone who will listen. When people don't do what you ask, it really bums you out.

When you wake up in the morning, you put on:

A. something a few sizes too big. You still need it to fit when you get angry later in the day.

B. something loose with a tight collar, long sleeves and legs to cover up your suit.

C. anything — it doesn't matter. Anyone in your way is getting cut down.

D. an expensive suit. You need it to be dark before putting on your suit.

E. anything that looks awesome. If the ladies see you out in anything less than the height of fashion, it could spell disaster to your image.

When faced with impossible odds and the task seems too difficult to complete, you:

A. punch your way out. The more desperate and angry you get, the more power you have, so everything eventually will work out.

B. confess your love to the woman you're saving. After she says she feels the same way, the weight from your shoulders is lifted, giving you enough strength to get out alive.

C. grit your teeth and bear down. The only way to deal with this is to get out alive.

D. pull a much-needed tool from your belt. Good thing you brought that pocket-sized jet pack!

E. assume the fetal position. You came in with enough qualified friends to get you out of this.

Your powers are a direct result of:

a. gamma radiation and being a hero. A dormant mutation did the rest.

b. a spider bite. You were in the wrong place at the wrong time and a radioactive arachnid thought you looked good for eating.

c. mutant testing. Some jerks did some testing on you using adamantium, and you are now doubly indestructible.

d. nothing — you have no powers.

Just a lot of money and good ideas.

e. birth — you were born with them. You didn't have to do any work to get them, so it worked out pretty well.

Your weakness is:

a. your temper. It has gotten you into some messy situations.

b. your ego. You can never decide whether you want to accept your destiny or go your own way.

c. nothing. That's how cool you are.

d. the same as any normal human being.

e. situations that bum you out.

Mostly A's

For what reason did you get involved with fighting?
I took a self-defense class when I first moved to Topeka. The ladies that taught the class also worked at a karate school, where I met my sensei. I liked the style and working out. I started doing local karate tournaments in 2002 and became the United States National Jujitsu Kumite Champion. I won nationals and went on to the world games in 2004 and was fighting for the bronze when I was disqualified for excessive force. I decided to try amateur kickboxing and amateur boxing, and I ended up in mixed martial arts.

What motivates you?
It is the challenge. Mixed martial arts is like a chess match. A win is equivalent to a checkmate.

What awards and medals have you won?
I won the Middle Weight World Champion for Fatal Fennes Fighting title, and I was the 2002 United States National Jujitsu Kumite Champion.

What do you consider to be your biggest achievement?
It is a toss up between getting my undergrad with department honors, a master's degree or world title. They are all pretty close.

To what personal attributes do you contribute your success?
A lot of it is hard work, being too stubborn to quit, a lot of time management and not being afraid to fail. Just jumping in there to see if I can do it.

Where do you see yourself in five years?
Finally being done with school. I would like to see myself working for a university that focuses on education rather than research. And I would like to teach a lot more self-defense clinics.

Former instructor an expert in genealogy

By Elise Podhajsky
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Carefully straightening the precious contents of a manila folder, Thirkelle Harris Howard sat with the poise and confidence of a well-researched historian. Civil wars and scientific theories did not grace the pages of her file, but rather lists of ancestors and family trees. Howard is an expert historian on her past.

However, the former K-State instructor of genealogy and family history did not always know about her ancestors. When she was a sophomore at Wichita East High School, her social studies teacher assigned the class to fill out an ancestry tree. While her classmates brought back pages and pages of family history, Howard – the only African-American child in her class – struggled to fill just one page. But 45 years later, one never would have guessed it.

At first, Howard contacted as many known relatives as she could, asking for information about their parents and grandparents. But coming from a long line of slaves, her family knew very little about their past.

"My granddad was a slave in Tennessee, and I knew his last name was Harris," she said, "but my dad never knew his father's sisters and brothers because his father didn't know them. My granddad died in 1923 when my father was still young, and there was just no information."

A young Howard continued to ask her oldest aunts, uncles and cousins about their elders, determined to find out where she and her family had come from – a curiosity that eventually sparked a passion that still burns today.

In addition to teaching genealogy courses, Howard was the director of the multicultural engineering program at K-State for eight years and the administrator for the Kansas Department on Aging in Topeka for 10 years prior to that. Now that she is retired – she let out a chuckle, "Retired? I'll never really be retired." – Howard is volunteering at the Manhattan Public Library leading genealogy-help classes once a month to assist others in their family-history quest.

Linda Henderson, research department employee at the library, helped Howard set up the classes and said she was very pleased with the first class last Tuesday.

"Everybody was there with different skills, different talents and different questions and Thirkelle did a great job," Henderson said. "She wants to be able to help as many people as she can."

In the classes, Howard guides attendees through genealogical Web sites like Ancestry.com and Heritage.com. She said she believes one of the best resources for uncovering your deep roots is the Internet.

But when Howard began her quest, her family was stumped and there were no computers, so it was not as simple as clicking through a few links. Instead, she turned to the U.S. Census. Every 10 years, the government conducts the household surveys. Howard said public census records are available from 1930 back to 1780, when the census first began.

However, prior to 1860, many blacks were considered property and not free citizens. Howard said she has had to look at property records from her ancestors' slave masters – the same way you would look up livestock – to find clues to her past. But soon enough, the computer was made popular and shortly after, the World Wide Web.

Howard said in some cases, she has been able to find the location of her ancestors' plantations and who their slave owners were but still needed some extra help. She said she began posting information on Ancestry.com, asking people to respond if they were related in any way. Almost immediately, Howard began receiving e-mails.

"Since more African Americans were brought here as slaves and have been here since 1820, we have at least seven, eight, or nine generations of family members that are here," she said. "Most African Americans are at least seventh or eighth cousins in this country – it's just a matter of finding out where they lived."

After decades of research, Howard is truly a master at her craft, now able to speak with knowledge and confidence about who she is, where she came from and where she has yet to go.

"Learning more about my family and the history of Africa gives you more of an insight to why you are the way you are," Thirkelle said. "There's a saying that says you have to know the past – which is your ancestors, in order to understand the present – which is you, in order to change or improve upon the future. If you don't know the past, you don't really know why you are the way you are."

She said family history is one of the most popular things for people to look up online.

"Most people have about between 100 and 150 thousand living relatives," Howard said. "How many of them do you know?"

Army, also produced more than five billion rounds for hunting and police use last year, making the company the country's largest ammunition manufacturer. However, this is not stopping the effects of the shortage on the average sportsman, according to local business owners.

"It limits you on what you can order," said Patrick Livingston, owner of Pat's Pawn and Gun in Ogdan, Kan. "You don't get eight to 10 cases, you get one or two, and all the major companies have raised the wholesale cost 30 percent."

Livingston said the .223 and .776 ammunitions were affected the most by the shortage. He said while he does not feel he has lost business, he said customers are complaining about the increased cost. He said he expects the shortage to continue.

"Yeah, it's supposed to continue to rise; they said you better buy now because it will just keep going up," Livingston said. "It's just going out of the world, isn't it?"

Finkeldei said the main development group in the Office of Mediated Education is the one that builds and maintains K-State Online and both Computing and Telecommunications Services and the Information Technology Assistance Center also are involved.

Before the actual August release, Finkeldei said a beta version is released at the beginning of July, and faculty members go to sessions to learn about the new features and provide feedback.

"We polished it one more time at the end of July, based on direct feedback from faculty and staff," he said.

Finkeldei said students can come to those sessions as well, but he also said the office has not found an effective way to reach students and encourage them to provide feedback.

"We are trying to come up with more ways to involve students more directly," he said. "What we need is a good method to communicate out to the students."

"We're very interested in student feedback. I definitely encourage students to let us know what they want to see different," Whitney O'Neill, junior in business, said she uses K-State Online every day to check her grades and print off class notes.

O'Neill said there are helpful new features on the site, like a column on the side of the home page where students can leave notes for themselves.

"I like (the new K-State Online) because even before you click on the class, it tells you if your teacher has posted any of your grades or if they have posted any new announcements or anything like that," she said.

"You can move around which classes you want on top, and you can hide previous classes you've had."

Federal judge declines Kansas abortion case

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WICHITA – A federal judge has refused to block the seating of a Kansas grand jury sought by abortion opponents to look into whether Dr. George Tiller broke state law on late-term abortions.

"Frankly, I'm reluctant to jump into the middle of something that is essentially a state matter," U.S. District Judge J. Thomas Marten said Tuesday.

"The odds that any appellate court would uphold an injunction in this case would be pretty remote," Marten said that while Tiller's lawyers made a strong case, he did not believe he should take the rare step of issuing orders to a state court. He suggested the Wichita doctor instead refile in state court.

Tiller's lawyers plan to do just that, attorney Lee Thompson said Wednesday.

"We are grateful for his encouragement that these issues would be just as likely to be sustained by a state court," Thompson said, adding that the court recognized that there were some substantial issues presented.

Thompson also said Tiller's attorneys have not yet decided whether they will continue to pursue the federal case.

In seeking the investigation of Tiller, abortion foes used a 1970 state law that allows the public to petition for a grand jury. Sedgwick County Election Commissioner Bill Gale said petitioners had gathered more than twice the number of signatures of registered voters required to compel the local court to form the grand jury. He certified the petition Tuesday.

It's the second time in less than 18 months that abortion opponents have petitioned for a grand jury to investigate Tiller. Last year, they succeeded in convening one to review the death of a Texas woman who had an abortion at Tiller's clinic, but no indictment was returned.

Tiller's attorneys had sought a temporary restraining order to prohibit Gale and Sedgwick County Administrative Judge Michael Corrigan from seating another grand jury.

They argued that another grand jury probe would be "unfair, harassing and bad faith."

They also noted that Tiller has been investigated repeatedly in the past year. He currently is charged with 19 misdemeanors for allegedly failing to get an independent second opinion on some late-term abortions, as required by state law. A previous case alleging Tiller didn't have the medical reasons necessary to justify late-term abortions was dismissed for jurisdictional reasons in December.

"The fact that the proposed grand jury is generated by a vigilante effort doesn't excuse the fact that it is a criminal proceeding instigated under color of state law and part of a repeated, persistent and harassing effort to induce criminal prosecution of Dr. George Tiller by those who oppose lawful abortion," his attorneys argued in court papers.

Abortion opponents were unaware of the federal court challenge until after the hearing.

charged with rapeBy Elise Podhajsky
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A Fort Riley man was charged Wednesday for a rape that occurred in July.

Michael Wakester was charged for the rape of an 18-year-old female that occurred on July 14 in Manhattan.

Wakester, 33, allegedly met the victim in Aggieville where the two had a few drinks, according to a police report. They went to the suspect's hotel room, where the report said the victim was held against her will and raped at about 1:30 a.m.

Police said she reported the incident shortly after she was allowed to leave. The suspect was known to the victim, who reported no other injuries.

Police issued a warrant Sept. 6 for Wakester's arrest. He was taken into custody and confined Wednesday.

Wakester has been charged with kidnapping, rape and aggravated criminal sodomy.

Knife threat

A man led police on a chase through Manhattan after allegedly threatening four men with a knife early yesterday morning, according to a Riley County Police Department report.

According to the report, the four victims were walking in the north alley of the 1200 block of Moro Street. The suspect, 19-year-old Julio Deleon Jr., pulled up behind the men in a 2007 gold Ford Focus and revved his engine. All but one man moved out of the alley when Deleon got out of his vehicle and approached the men in a hostile manner, Lt. Kurt Moldrup of

Wefald

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

President Jon Wefald will address the K-State community in his 22nd-annual State of the University Address at 3 p.m. today.

During the scheduled two-hour address in K-State Alumni Center ballrooms B and C, Faculty Senate President Franklin Spikes and Provost M. Duane Nellis will give brief presentations about the university, said Charles Reagan, associate to the president.

Wefald will discuss the future of the university and the achievements that have positioned K-State for a bright future, Reagan said. He also said the address is an opportunity for the provost and president to discuss issues like university funding, university priorities and goals for the future.

"I think students and faculty can benefit by learning more about the university and learn more about the exciting things that are going on in the university," Reagan said. "They also can learn about how decisions in the past — especially setting priorities — have led to successes in the university."

Copies of Wefald's speech will be available afterward. The speech also will have a live video stream at www.k-state.edu/provost/about/sou07.htm.

Stuck in debt

Center to help students with financial problemsBy Salena Strate
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

To meet the need of rising student credit debt, K-State's student body president is forming a committee for his vision of a financial planning center.

Matt Wagner, student body president and senior in management information systems, said his vision for the project is to select a general corporation or several certified financial planners, or CFPs, who would be willing to be housed at K-State through sponsorship from the university.

"It is not going to cost anything very big," he said. "It will take the ability to step out and ask a corporation."

The committee consists of 10 students and two additional faculty members — one from the College of Human Ecology who works with financial planning and one KSU Foundation representative.

"Students will be able to receive financial advice by these CFPs so they are prepared to exit college with as minimal debt as possible," Wagner said.

According to a recent survey conducted by the College of Human Ecology, 31 percent of students have credit cards in their own name. It also said 89 percent of the card carriers are the main payers of their bill.

Amanda Freeman, instructor of economics, said the economic department has a guideline suggesting people do not acquire more debt than they can pay off.

She said students should think about the overall amount of debt.

"Only 20 percent of college students that have credit cards are actually paying off the balance," Freeman said. "(Credit card) offers on campus have increased. There is more and more pressure to get a bonus, and for students who haven't dealt with that, it is difficult to make an informed decision."

Tyler Vigil, personal banks and loans officer at INTRUST Bank, said for first-time credit holders, balances should not exceed more than $1,000 for a few years.

"Basically, companies tend to target students unaware of possible interest penalties and late payments," Vigil said. "These companies make their base profit off a younger adult."

He also said depending on a grace period is not a good idea. INTRUST Bank's policy for a granted grace period is at least 20 days if the new balance from the two previous statements was paid in full by each respective due date, Vigil said.

According to a study conducted by the Institute of Personal Financial Planning at K-State, 10 percent of students are in serious debt to the point where their credit is damaged and they have difficulty paying their bills.

There are some cases where serious credit card problems can lead to dropping out of college or reducing the number of hours students are enrolled in class because of work obligations.

"The more informed you are, the better," Freeman said. "Always read the fine print to avoid a crisis."

STAY OUT OF DEBT

Commerce Bank president Tom Giller suggests these tips for students to stay out of credit card debt.

- Set spending limits — daily, weekly and/or monthly — and don't exceed them.
- Keep track of every purchase. Don't wait for your monthly bill to add it up.
- Pay your balance each month to avoid additional fees and interest charges.
- Review your statement each month to ensure the charges and fees are correct.
- Pay more than the minimum amount due each month.

Reception unites international students from 100 countries

By Mayra Rivarola
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The International Student Reception offered the Society the Appreciation of Bharatiya Heritage & Arts an opportunity to promote an upcoming event.

SABHA plans to sponsor a concert Saturday at McCa- Auditorium, and the organization expects students who attended Thursday night's International Student Reception also will attend the concert, said Sudha Pisipati, SABHA president and graduate student in agronomy.

SABHA is one of several international organizations represented at the fourth-annual reception at Union Station in the K-State Student Union. SABHA is an organization focused in promoting classical music and dance from India, Pisipati said.

"There are a lot of students who attend the event — not only international but many American students," Pisipati said. "It is a good way to advertise our event and promote it to the community."

Pisipati said she considers the reception important in the promotion of the organization. While it also is promoted through the International Student Center and Helping International Students, organization members prefer to promote SABHA through the reception because of the number of students who attend, Pisipati said.

Pisipati is one of 1,000 international students who represent more than 100 countries at K-State. About 400 students at K-State are from India, which represents the largest group from a country.

About 80 students attended the reception Thursday night, which included students from Turkey, Uzbekistan, Brazil, Paraguay, Japan and the Czech Republic. Students met other international students, as well as students from the United States, at the reception and tried different ethnic foods. They also received information about various international events on campus.

Japanese Yosakoi Dance Club members started the reception with one of their performances representing a Japanese fishing ritual. Food also was offered to students, including Alloo Gobbi, a dry Indian curry made with pota-

The Union Program Council sponsored the reception, and the Multicultural Committee organized the event. The purpose of the International Student Reception is to promote the different international student organizations at K-State, said Trini Najera, UPC Multicultural Committee co-chair and senior in hotel and restaurant management.

"It's a great opportunity to find out about the international activities that are going on this semester," said Sandra Contreras, graduate student in modern languages from Colombia. "It is so much better than receiving e-mails."

SGA approves new appointments, special committees

By Whitney Hodgins
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Student Senate approved the appointment of two senators and 23 interns at its meeting Thursday.

Jared Schnefke, sophomore in finance, was appointed student senator for the College of Business Administration, and Adam Wagoner, senior in architecture, was appointed student senator for the college of his concentration.

"I had a great experience as an intern last year, and wanted to serve as a voting member through a senate position," Schnefke said. "But when I ran for a seat last spring, I was ninth in line for eight senator positions."

"Since one of the senators resigned recently, I was offered the job. I'm looking forward to being a link between the College of Business and SGA."

Though 25 internship positions were available for the 2007-08 student senate term, only 23 interns were appointed because of their outstanding qualifications, said Nick Piper, student senate chair and senior in finance.

"I look to the leaders in this room for motivation," he said.

"I'm very excited to be giving these individuals the tools they need to maximize their potential as leaders."

Mark Sundahl, freshman in biology, said he interviewed for an internship position despite not having participated in politics in the past.

"I wasn't on the student council in high school or have been part of anything really political," Sundahl said. "But I wanted to get more acquainted with the governing system on campus."

"Maybe I'll run for a senator position eventually, but I know at least I'll get the chance to help K-State and improve my persuasion skills."

The student senate also approved the creation of two special committees concerning a Dead Week policy and a financial planning center for K-State.

The creation of the special committee to study a Dead Week policy received unanimous support, and only one vote was cast against the creation of a special committee to study a financial planning center for K-State.

A special committee to establish a pilot program entitled "Students Governing Association Ambassador Program" also was created to improve public relations and communication between the senate and its constituents.

Fourteen senate members will be appointed to the committee, which first will study the effects of the ambassador-student outreach program before determining which measures would be most effective for this school year.

Bush supports Gen. Petraeus in presidential address Thursday night

By Willow Williamson
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The strategy of increasing troops in Iraq is working and some should be coming home in December, President Bush said in his address to the nation Thursday night.

"There come moments that decide the direction of a country and reveal the character of its people," Bush said. "We are now at such a moment."

In January, the United States increased its troops in Iraq by 30,000. Bush said this increase has worked to stabilize Iraq.

"One year ago, much of Baghdad was under siege," he said. "Schools were closed, markets were shuttered, and sectarian violence was spiraling out of control.

"Today, most of Baghdad's neighborhoods are being patrolled by Coalition and Iraqi forces who live among the people they protect. Many schools and markets are reopening. Citizens are coming forward with vital intelligence. Sectarian killings are down, and ordinary life is beginning to return."

Bush focused especially on the troop's successes in Baghdad and the Anbar province in Iraq, where he said the increased presence of troops has helped the two cities begin to be more peaceful.

"Today, a city where al-Qaida once planted its flag is beginning to return to normal," Bush said. "Anbar citizens who once feared heading for talking to an American or Iraqi soldier now come forward to tell us where the terrorists are hiding."

Bush said he supports Gen. David Petraeus' recommendation that soon the U.S. can maintain security in Iraq with fewer troops. He said 5,700 troops should be able to come home by Christmas, and by July he said Petraeus estimated the United States could reduce the number of combat brigades from 20 to 15.

The United States is succeeding in Iraq, Bush said and he congratulated the troops, who along with the Iraqi forces have captured or killed about 1,500 enemy fighters each month since January.

"These gains are a tribute to our military, they are a tribute to the courage of the Iraqi Security Forces, and they are a tribute to an Iraqi government that has decided to take on the extremists."

These gains are the main reason he is supporting Petraeus' recommendation.

"The principle guiding my decisions on troop levels in Iraq is 'return on success,' he said. "The more successful we are, the more American troops can return home. And in all we do, I will ensure that our commanders on the ground have the troops and flexibility they need to defeat the enemy."

Bush said the Iraqi government has not met certain legislative goals, but he has made it clear to them they must meet these goals to be successful.

"The way forward depends on the ability of Iraq to maintain security gains," Bush said.

Bush addressed several different groups during his speech, including Iraqi citizens, the troops in Iraq and the international community. He asked Congress to come together on the "policy of strength in the Middle East" and to join him in his decision to support Petraeus.

George Weston, president of the College Republicans graduate student in sociology, said he agreed with Bush's decision to support Petraeus.

"I fully support what Gen. Petraeus is doing in Iraq over people who haven't even been to Iraq," Weston said. "Hopefully congress will continue to fund this effort."

Students should listen to the president's address, he said, because it is good to hear information from the primary source.

"When you hear about what's going on in Iraq, there is a filter, and that's the media," he said.

Students from the Young Democrats could not be reached for comment.

Bush ended his address by saying it is not too late to hope for Iraq.

"Some say the gains we are making in Iraq come too late," he said. "They are mistaken. It is never too late to deal a blow to al-Qaida. It is never too late to advance freedom. And it is never too late to support our troops in a fight they can win."

TO THE POINT

Credit cards not necessary

It is impossible to open mail and not see a promise from a credit-card company. When times are rough and funds are short, promises of quick money are tempting and reel in many college students.

While credit cards and other loan options are not bad, it can be easy for students to get caught up in the wishes of today and forget about the needs of tomorrow.

College is a time to enjoy the transitional period before entering a full-time job, and the last thing a new graduate wants to have is high debt and low prospects.

A bad credit rating is like a scarlet letter when it comes to applying for financial opportunities, and the high-interest rates and late fees associated with credit cards are not pleasant either.

A campus financial planning center would benefit students, but while the university waits for this work in progress, students should evaluate themselves to avoid future bad credit and high debt.

Students can avoid financial problems by keeping a budget and sticking with it.

They also should be cautious of the credit cards that are available in countless places, like the mall or in many department and clothing stores. Before signing anything, students should decide if the card is something they truly need and something they can handle.

And most importantly, students should carefully read the fine print and understand all the terms in the card agreements. Just because something seems like a good idea at the time, its future ramifications can hang around much longer.

TO THE POINT is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

Demand for ethanol energy raising food prices

The vice grip of fuel prices has tightened around the pocketbook not only at the pump, but in the food market as well.

Blasted over the speakers of Snyder Family Stadium on game day are different advertisements for companies or associations.

For at least four years, those in attendance have seen and heard an advertisement for ethanol – "good for the environment and good for Kansas farmers."

After a report released by the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development on Sept. 11, we should consider changing this advertisement to say, "bad for the environment and horrible for world markets."

As gasoline prices and fears about global warming increase, demand for alternative fuels has skyrocketed.

Kansas farmers have enjoyed the high demand for their crops as we approach the fall harvest season.

Though this year is supposed to be successful, these increased profits will not continue.

These higher profits are driven directly by people wanting to have cleaner sources of energy.

Information for and against global warming is out there, but the environmental damage from chemicals is indisputable.

According to an article in Reuters on Sept. 11, "When acidification, fertilizer use, biodiversity loss and toxicity of agricultural pesticides are taken into account, the overall environmental impacts of ethanol and biodiesel can very easily exceed those of petrol and mineral diesel."

By attempting to make green fuels, we are doing more damage to the environment in the long run.

The damage caused is not just restricted to the environment, but to the pocketbooks of consumers in the United States and abroad.

According to a report by the Grocery Manufacturers Association to Congress in May "Food processors and biofuel producers now increasingly compete in the same commodity markets."

BRETT KING

Biofuels like ethanol and biodiesel are the root cause for the farm commodities spike in corn, grain, oilseeds and sugar.

These increases in the commodities markets have caused spikes in the price of food at all local grocery stores.

Many of us don't look at things like the price of milk when we shop. Milk has been hovering near $4 a gallon.

Other items like bread, meat, dairy and cooking oils, also have increased in price over the past few years.

The Washington Post explained on Jan. 27 that the American demand for corn has driven up the price of tortillas in Mexico to $1.81 for 2.2 pounds.

This might not seem like a lot, but when considering the Mexican minimum wage is $4.60 a day, it becomes a huge chunk of their daily income.

Cal Dooley, GMA president and chief executive officer, said in report to Congress concerning an aggressive approach to ethanol production, the result would reduce U.S. exports of corn to foreign countries and, "will result in a decrease in the amount of food available overseas, which in turn will have a negative effect on world hunger."

As we draw closer to fall harvest and many farmers are pleased to see their potential profits up, remember the costs of goods also have increased.

There might be an increase in profits now, but costs of agriculture also will continue to rise.

Research in ethanol and other biofuels only will provide a temporary solution.

The true solution lies in research that doesn't make us choose food or fuel.

Sen. Clinton's presidential campaign might suffer despite admitting wrongdoing, returning questionable donations

Sen. Hillary Clinton's campaign is returning $850,000 in contributions linked to Norman Hsu, a fundraiser under FBI investigation for whether he paid donors to contribute to political campaigns.

After questionable campaign donations were made to the re-election campaign of Bill Clinton and Al Gore in 1996 by Chinese investors, investigating major donations should be at the forefront of all Democrats' minds.

The Clinton Campaign made the gallant effort to return funds to preserve the political dignity in this election. Clinton made a smart move in pre-empting what could have become a major Republican attack against her campaign. She did this with style and grace, while maintaining the Democratic Party platform.

According to the official Democratic Party Web site, the democratic national agenda "is committed to real ethics reform and meaningful campaign finance reform that protects our rights and ensures that elected officials act ethically."

Clinton is upholding the ideals of the party by stepping forward and acknowledging one of her biggest fundraisers, Hsu, might have been wrong in his manner of seeking donations.

When questions first were raised, the campaign took immediate action, saying they would donate $23,000 in received funds from Hsu to a charity.

Now, the campaign is returning $850,000 contributed by others who might have been influenced by Hsu and allowing Clinton's supporters to donate to the campaign again if they choose.

"It was very difficult for us to make any decision other than returning the contributions that were in any way connected to him, but that is what we decided to do," Clinton said in an Associated Press Wednesday.

How Hsu became so closely connected to one of today's most prominent political figures is questionable.

Hsu had been wanted for missing his sentencing in a 1991 grand theft case, in which he pleaded no contest. Hsu was scheduled to appear in court last week to surrender his passport and negotiate the $2-million bail from his previous arrest, then skipped town and had a new warrant issued for his arrest. He is now being detained in a hospital located in Grand Junction, Colo., according to the AP report.

Hsu is a campaign "bundler" – he sought out the support of other donors for specific campaigns, as well as making personal donations.

Now that a huge portion of Clinton's campaign fund will be given away, there is a great need for the campaign to raise more money and to do so quickly. Luckily the Clinton Campaign had a fundraiser Wednesday night, which raised about $500,000.

The Clinton campaign has revised the way in which it does background checks on its contributors since the Hsu incident, though this precaution should have been in its agenda from the beginning.

Her husband's 1996 re-election campaign should have served as a learning experience for her political endeavors. The last thing a candidate like Clinton needs is questionable campaign financing ethics. Though the situation was handled well, Hsu's connection to the campaign is definitely not beneficial.

Harmony Week selects theme of 'Building a Diverse, Inclusive Manhattan'

By Adrienne DeWeese
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State and Manhattan will work together starting Sunday to make the community more diverse and inclusive during the 19th-annual Community Cultural Harmony Week.

"Building a Diverse, Inclusive Manhattan," the week's theme, includes speakers, presentations and workshops that focus on living in an inclusive — rather than exclusive — community, said Doug Benson, Harmony Week co-chair and professor of modern languages.

"In many communities, some people move in and never feel welcome," Benson said. "Many communities are falling apart because the different populations don't communicate and interact. Manhattan's done a pretty good job of (communicating), but we need to do a better job."

The planning committee selected the week's theme based on what needed emphasis this year, Benson said. Planning for the week each year starts in March, he said.

Institute for Diverse Leadership Director Juanita Cox-Burton and her diversity workshop are among the week's highlights, Benson said.

Cox-Burton presented during Harmony Week six years ago, and she has worked with corporations like Frontier Airlines and the Denver Broncos, he said.

"She is hilarious and moving at the same time," Benson said. "She has a real gift for helping people begin to understand their own diversity and that of others and how to open the doors."

In 1988, then K-State student Barbara Baker started Racial/Ethnic Harmony Week with the support of Student Governing Association.

The week started as a result of an incident at the farmer Bushwacker's Club in Aggieville in June 1988. According to the Harmony Week Web site, Puerto Rican students rented the club to celebrate the day of San Juan or John the Baptist. Club employees hung signs that referenced San Juan with obscene language, and the case was taken to the state attorney general's office with the decision against the club.

The week's name changed to Community Cultural Harmony Week to include all diversity in the community, according to the Web site.

Baker recently completed her doctorate at the University of Massachusetts Amherst and is now the director of multicultural programs at Emporia State University.

During its 19-year history, Benson said the week has expanded the Manhattan community, which includes planning committee members from the City of Manhattan and Manhattan-Ogden USD 383. Students from Riley County High School also will attend events this year, Benson said.

"We're really excited about that because it just means it's growing further and further from the university and more into the communities," he said.

Benson said about 200 students participated in the week when it first started.

Last year, more than 3,500 students participated in its events, he said.

"We're really pleased to see this small event started by a K-State student to grow into one of the biggies in Manhattan," he said. "We work hard to allow people the access to events and speakers that can help them begin their own journey to realizing their ethnicity."

Candi Hironaka, Harmony Week co-chair, said numerous opportunities exist for K-State faculty members and students to learn about an inclusive community with this year's events.

Many speakers and presenters throughout the week have previous K-State connections, and this provides a focus on the university, said Hironaka, associate director of Leadership Studies and Programs.

"I call it a civic duty to find out what makes our community tick and what can I contribute to the community," Hironaka said.

"It's raising everyone's awareness. That — as a human being, as a person who lives in the world — is something that we should all care about very much."

Partner cities have similar characteristics despite being separated by thousands of miles

By Scott Girard
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The two cities are half a world apart, have a population disparity of approximately 40,000 and have completely different historical backgrounds.

But Manhattan mayor Tom Phillips said Manhattan and its partner city, Dobrichovice, Czech Republic, are more similar than most people expect.

"They face the same problems we face, and they hear the same citizen complaints we hear like fixing the roads and improving infrastructure," Phillips said.

Phillips, who along with seven other Manhattan residents including city commissioners visited Dobrichovice earlier this month, said the city has a commission, a mayor, a tax system and several community-planning similarities with Manhattan. He also said the language differences were slight. He said most citizens speak English, though Czech is the official language.

One of the aspects Phillips was most surprised about was the urban sprawl in Dobrichovice. He said the town is growing because Czech families are moving to the area and commuting to Prague.

"I often always thought of urban sprawl as an American phenomenon," he said.

Though the two cities share many community planning goals, Phillips said the cities have very different histories and communities.

The biggest difference, Phillips said, is the size difference. Phillips said Dobrichovice, which has a population of approximately 3,000, had several characteristics of a typical small European community.

Jeff Chapman, chairman of the Partner City Advisory Committee, said the town had an interesting mix of traditional community aspects and new modernizing aspects.

"They are a very small community and a bedroom community for Prague, but it's a booming place because it's a 10- to 20-minute drive to Prague," Chapman said.

History and traditions of the two cities were other differences, Phillips said. While Manhattan is 150 years old, Dobrichovice has hundreds of years of European history, including a castle which used to serve as the summer residence of a pope ambassador.

Phillips said the group ate at a restaurant in the castle. He said though the room they ate in had no electricity or running water and the structure has not been updated since the 17th century, he still thought of the place as a first-class restaurant.

Chapman said the group also attended the annual Dobrichovice wine festival on a local chateau.

Both Chapman and Phillips said the most outstanding characteristic of the community was the citizens' kindness and graciousness.

Phillips said the trip solidified the two cities' relationship and should allow the cities to expand their relationship.

"I think we have definitely cemented our partnership with this trip," Phillips said.

Phillips said he hopes the two communities will set up a student exchange with either K-State or the area school system. Phillips said the Manhattan group set up a Web cast between third grade classes in Dobrichovice and Manhattan. He said the Web cast went well and also should establish a connection between the schools.

Phillips said it also would be a good opportunity for K-State students who travel abroad to find families to live with in Dobrichovice.

"I would think it would be a great opportunity for students," Phillips said. "They are extremely friendly and compassionate."

The mayor, city commissioners and other Manhattan residents visited the castle in the town of Karlstein while visiting Dobrichovice, Czech Republic. Dobrichovice is Manhattan's partner city.

Chapman added that students should not be the only people thinking about traveling to the Czech Republic.

"Now that the partnership is in place, people in Manhattan are encouraged to travel there," he said.

Power Towels motivate Wildcats

Last week's game against San Jose State did more than just showcase the talents of the 2007 football team. It also marked the debut of the Power Towel, a new promotion introduced for K-State fans.

ADAM ASHMORE

Bigger than a washcloth and smaller than a bathroom towel, the Power Towel could be seen waving in the student section against San Jose State.

The towel has received mixed reviews from students - some like the idea, while others think it will never catch on.

I feel the Power Towel is here to stay. Granted, the idea is cliché and unoriginal to say the least, but that doesn't mean it can't work at K-State.

From the Pittsburgh Steelers' Terrible Towels to the Minnesota Twins' Homer Hankies, these promotions have helped other teams create an intimidating home-field advantage.

The Terrible Towels were there for the Pittsburgh Steelers' four Super Bowls in the 1970s, and the Homer Hankies were waving when the underdog Twins won the World Series in 1987.

These teams both had Hall of Famers and probably would have won championships with or without the towels. But maybe that home-field advantage produced the extra edge to push them over the hump.

The sea of purple at Snyder Family Stadium mimicked scenes I have watched of old Pittsburgh Steelers games. Fans would root on the old "Steel Curtain" by waving the yellow towels in harmony on big third-down situations.

The Power Towel isn't just an advertising tool created by corporate sponsors to make money. The idea was actually created by a K-State student, said Laura Tietjen, associate athletic director at K-State.

"The idea was then reviewed by an I-CAT student group and then student focus groups," she said.

The Power Towel idea wasn't exactly original, but K-State has made the promotion its own.

There's no way to tell if the Power Towel is here to stay. But when I was in the student section last week, the towels really added to the atmosphere of the game.

The towel can only become what K-State fans make of it - a cloth for wiping sweat off your face, or a tradition that will continue for seasons to come.

Campbell makes Butkus watch list

STAFF REPORT

Linebacker Ian Campbell was one of 65 players named to the watch list for the Butkus Award, given annually to the nation's top linebacker.

The junior has recorded 10 tackles and 1.5 sacks through two games this season. His 3.5 tackles-for-loss rank fifth in the Big 12 Conference.

He is one of four returning players in the nation who recorded at least 11.5 sacks and 17.5 tackles-for-loss last season.

Campbell is also on the watch list for the Hendricks Award for best defensive end and the Bednarik and Bronko Nagurski awards for best defensive player.

2007-08 Wildcat team blends youth, experience

By Mike DeVader
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State men's golf team has something every team wants - returning leadership and incoming talent.

The returning leadership is supplied by junior Robert Streb and senior Kyle Yonke, K-State's top two players a year ago.

Streb, who came within one stroke of making the cut at the U.S. Amateur this summer, said he worked hard to improve his short game in the offseason.

"I worked on putting a lot and I focused on hitting a lot of balls from 150 yards and in," Streb said. "I hit the range hard."

Yonke, meanwhile, is the lone senior on K-State's roster.

"Kyle Yonke is a great leader - in fact, he is also an Academic-All American," coach Tim Norris said. "I expect him to come in and help the new guys a great deal, both on and off the course."

The new players include freshmen Daniel Wood and Kyle Smell, two players Norris expects to contribute right away.

"Kyle Smell is a very, very talented player and I have seen him play a lot," Norris said.

"I expect him to contribute immediately since I see very few flaws in his game."

Smell has already left an impression on Yonke.

"Kyle has already stepped up for the team by qualifying for individual play in the tournament coming up that KU is hosting," Yonke said.

The Wildcats begin their season Sept. 17 at the Kansas Invitational, and Norris said getting off to a good start is a must.

"Obviously we want to get better and better as the season goes on, so I think we need to get off to a great start and just keep on rolling," he said.

K-State had 10 top-10 finishes in 2006, and Yonke wants to build off that momentum for this year.

"I'd call the season a success if we won two, maybe even three tournaments this year," Yonke said. "The Big 12 is one of the toughest golf leagues in the country, but we still expect to do very well in the Big 12 Championship."

K-State finished ninth at the Big 12 Championship last season and missed the regional tournament for the first time in five years. However, Streb said this year's team has the talent to get back into the postseason.

"Our whole team is more prepared coming into this year than we were last season," Streb said. "Regionals is very much within our reach, but if we play like we are supposed to I think we have a great chance at getting to Nationals."

When asked if he was ready for the season, Yonke's answer was simple.

"I just can't wait to get out there and play golf," he said.

SEASON OUTLOOK

Coach:

Tim Norris (11th season)

2006 Finish:

9th in the Big 12

Familiar faces:

Robert Streb, Kyle Yonke

Newcomers to watch:

Kyle Smell, Daniel Wood

Fall schedule:

Sept. 17-18: Kansas Invitational (Lawrence)

Sept. 24-25: Jim Colbert Intercollegiate

Oct. 8-9: Wolf Pack Classic (Reno, Nev.)

Oct. 22-23: Club Glove Intercollegiate (Somis, Calif.)

Oct. 29-30: Herb Wimberly Intercollegiate (Las Cruces, N.M.)

Nov. 5-7: Pacific Invitational (Stockton, Calif.)

Three questions:

1. Can K-State qualify for regionals after missing last season?

2. What can the Wildcats expect from newcomers Kyle Smell and Daniel Wood?

3. Can Streb top the course record he set at Colbert Hills?

Greeno Invitational at Nebraska will be longest race, largest meet yet

By Wendy Haun
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Christopher Hanewinkel | COLLEGIAN

The cross country team will head to Lincoln, Neb., this weekend for the Woody Greeno Invitational. Last weekend the women's team defeated Kansas for the first time ever.

For cross country newcomer Mike Sickafoose, this weekend's goal is just to finish the 8-kilometer Woody Greeno Invitational.

Sickafoose, who fell 300 yards from the finish line in last Friday's K-State/KU dual, said he didn't injure his Achilles tendon as previously thought. In fact, a new pair of shoes has all he needed.

"The new shoes give me more heel support," Sickafoose said. "The shoes I ran in the first race were spiked, and I had never used spikes in a cross-country race. Hopefully I'll be finishing this time."

Sickafoose and the rest of the cross country team will look at Nebraska at Saturday's invitational in Lincoln, Neb. The Husker women were ranked No. 4 in the Midwest Region in the latest coaches' poll, while the men are ranked No. 12. K-State's women were ranked No. 11 and the men came in at No. 14.

This will be the largest meet yet for K-State, with a field of more than 600 runners. Even so, coach Michael Smith said his runners expect success.

"They just need to go out and execute," Smith said. "They're good, and they're training really well. I would expect it to continue. I expect that success will come as soon as possible so that we can get better."

The Greeno Invitational also will be the longest race yet for the K-State runners. The women will run six kilometers, while the men will run an 8K.

The increased distance isn't a concern for Smith.

"There's nothing I can do about it," Smith said. "I think they just need to make the adjustment. This is a meet where they can go and get used to running 6 kilometers. They have no choice."

Sickafoose said his training has him feeling ready for this weekend.

"It's a frightening distance, but I think I can handle it after the workouts that the coach has been giving us," he said. "I'm confident that I can make the step up to the longer distance."

Wildcats look to extend sweep streak against Baylor in Ahearn Field House

By Joel Jellison
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

After sweeping its past four opponents, it is safe to say the K-State volleyball team is on a roll.

The Wildcats (9-2) will attempt to make it a fifth straight when they take on Baylor in their Big 12 home opener at 1 p.m. Saturday in the Ahearn Field House.

Baylor lost its Big 12 opener Wednesday, getting swept by Iowa State. But K-State coach Suzie Fritz said every game is tough in the Big 12 Conference.

"They're all tough from here on out," Fritz said. "That's just the way the league is. I feel good about the way we are playing. It is still very early in the year and we still have a lot of things we can get better and improve on."

Junior outside hitter Rita Liliom said the team hopes to continue the sweeps streak but will be happy with a win of any variety.

"We are definitely ready for them," Liliom said. "We want to play our side and we want to play our side back-to-back."

The Wildcats' offense has been fueled by attack leaders Nataly Korobkova and Liliom this season, with middle blockers Kelsey Chipman and Megan Farr adding a few timely kills.

"I would say Chipman and Farr are doing equally as much - they just don't take as many swings because of the position that they play,"

Fritz said. "They are doing a nice job of spreading it around a little bit."

The Wildcats looked well-prepared for their Big 12 opener, a 3-0 sweep of Kansas on Wednesday. The Wildcats might have their strong preseason schedule to thank for that.

"I thought we were well-prepared for conference play just simply because we've had a very competitive preseason schedule," Fritz said. "We've played some very talented teams, so I felt as though we were prepared so that when we got into a conference matchup, it wasn't going to be the first time we've seen great volleyball."

K-State's fast start is particularly surprising because the Wildcats were picked to

"I like being picked low in the conference," Fritz said. "It doesn't matter where they pick us in the beginning, what matters most is where we finish in the end and we've always finished higher than they pick us."

Fritz attributed much of the Wildcats' early-season success to their ability to come through in the clutch.

"We still aren't starting games very well, but we are finding a way to play well late in matches, which I think is allowing us to be successful," she said.

Local wine bar wins 'Best of Award of Excellence'

By Monica Castro
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The 4 Olives Wine Bar is the only restaurant in Kansas to win the Wine Spectator's "Best of Award of Excellence."

Scott Benjamin, owner of 4 Olives, said the award surprised him this year.

In 2005-06, the restaurant won the "Award of Excellence," which is a level below what this year's award, Benjamin said.

"We were really surprised to win because we thought that we had gotten out of our range," he said. "The standards for the Wine Spectator go up every year."

He said he is proud to win because of the effort they spent on their inventory and also revising their menu and wine list.

The Wine Spectator judges which restaurant receives the award by the size of wine regions, the number of types of wines offered, vertical selection of the same wine brand of different vintages, wine storage and food and wine pairing, Benjamin said. The Wine Spectator also looks at how well the staff is trained in describing the available wines.

The bar offers more than 642 different wines, 600 items at the bar and 65 different types of beers, Benjamin said. He said he also selects the finest quality meats and produce.

Benjamin said he wanted 4 Olives to give everyone the opportunity to see the wine offered, so the wine storage is located in the front of the restaurant in a clear storage room. He said he is proud of the racking system in the storage room because it allows one to clearly see the label, unlike most wine racks that allow the customer to view the cap.

"We are the only restaurant to have (the award) in Kansas, which is very impressive," said Jennifer Sturich, senior in nutrition science and employee at 4 Olives.

Sturich also said because the restaurant received such a prestigious award, it will receive more recognition.

Tom and Elizabeth Lindquist, Manhattan residents, said the restaurant had a great atmosphere and it was upscale.

"The restaurant provides a dining experience you can't find anywhere in Manhattan," Tom Lindquist said.

He said they choose to come to the restaurant because of the cosmopolitan atmosphere and unique food.

He said he thinks more people will come to the restaurant because it has received this award.

K-State community to vote on 5 names for Hale Library Café

By Andy Heintz
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

It went from 300 possibilities to five.

Students have the opportunity to rate and ultimately select the name of Hale Library's new café.

Students can take a survey at the K-State Library Web site where they rate the five names on a scale of one to five. The survey will be open to students until 11:59 p.m. Sunday. The name that receives the best rating wins, and will be announced Sept. 26.

The selection committee decided the five final names on Monday - The Bookend Café, Sunflower Café, The Bookdrop Café, Common Grounds and Hale Library Café.

While people might have called the café "Hale Library Café," it is not the official name, said Roberta Johnson, director of financial services and facilities at Hale.

The café, which opened Aug. 20, had a selection committee made up of three staff members from the K-State Student Union and three staff members from Hale Library who collected suggested names for the café.

About 300 names were submitted to the committee. Tara Coleman, assistant president of Hale, said people could submit as many names as they wanted. While anyone could submit suggestions, only K-State students were eligible for prizes.

"Some people submitted 20 names, and some people submitted one name," Coleman said.

The names submitted had to contain a few details to be selected, said Tom Mahoney, K-State Student Union marketing and sales manager and member of the selection committee.

"The name needed to convey its location and that it is a café," Mahoney said.

The first-place prize will be an iPod nano. The second-place prize will be a $50 Union gift certificate, and the third-place prize will be a $25 Union gift certificate.

Students can vote for their favorite café name by going to www.lib.ksu.edu.

Organization offers new services locally

Located at 308 Poyntz Ave., the Salvation Army is a thrift store where members of the community can purchase and donate clothing items as well as furniture.

Joslyn Brown | COLLEGIAN

By Salena Strate
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Free wireless Internet and store renovations are a few improvements the Salvation Army has made since the hire of its captain.

Robert Buttrey, captain of the Salvation Army of Manhattan, said his vision was to turn around the disorganized thrift store, increase social services to the public and create a nondenominational church. He has accomplished all these goals. The renovations to the Salvation Army Thrift Store, occurred shortly after Buttrey and his wife Lynn arrived in Manhattan two years ago.

"We painted and bought new counters for the check-out area," he said. "Pretty soon we are going to a barcode pricing system. When we hire a new store supervisor, that will take place."

Teresa Bardwell, community care director, said the thrift store was not conducive to the amount of inventory they had.

"We wanted an environment where it was clean and for the store to be appealing," Bardwell said. "And for safety reasons, we wanted people in wheelchairs to be able to navigate through the store."

Andrew Amaro, store clerk, said the new coffee area helps him see people and directly ask what services they need.

With the renovations complete, the Salvation Army received word in July that they qualified for a K-State grant. The grant, the Kansas Career work-study, encourages the Salvation Army to hire K-State students. Buttrey said as positions are available, their first resource will be K-State students.

"Our community care office is a good way to volunteer, especially if (students) are interested in social work," Buttrey said. "They can help with case management and getting the clients' information."

Other services students can become involved with include organizing the clothes closet and participating in Bible studies at the Salvation Army church.

"The biggest thing is that we are a church," he said. "We are a Bible-based Christian church, and most people don't know that. I don't think people realize all the areas that we help in the community."

Buttrey said the community knows the Salvation Army provides a thrift store, but that is not their whole identity. He said that is just a portion of what the Salvation Army does. The church, located on the side of the thrift store, is a nondenominational church.

"There are a lot of people who fall through the cracks," Buttrey said. "There are a lot of agencies in town, and we try not to duplicate our services."

"We are really a last-resort agency, which means that when people go to other agencies - if they can't get help there, they are referred to the Salvation Army."

Students can remove directory information

By Whitney Hodglin
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State students some times refer to it as "stalker net."

The People pages are part of K-State's online student directory, an easily accessible electronic phone book that anyone can use to find information about enrolled students including phone numbers, e-mail addresses, local addresses and academic majors.

However, students concerned about the availability of such information do have the option to remove their profiles from all school directories.

Students of public universities that receive funds from the U.S. Department of Education have the right to inspect, review and amend their educational records, according to the Family Educational Rights and Privacy Act of 1974.

Submitting a formal request to the Office of the Registrar in Anderson Hall will restrict access to such information and deny confirmation of the student's relationship with K-State to any inquiring party.

The People pages are updated nightly, so requests are usually processed and applied in a timely manner.

"If a student decides to withhold information from the directory, their entire profile will be removed," said Gunile Devault, associate registrar at K-State. "It's all or nothing."

K-State provides copies of the FERPA policy along with students' rights in undergraduate and graduate catalogs and in course schedules. Students also can request a copy of the FERPA in the registrar's office.

Each university can choose how much information it includes in the student directory, Devault said.

"I think it would be easier to pick and choose what information is displayed on the People pages, but I'm not really worried about being stalked," said Abbey Norris, sophomore in food and nutrition-exercise science. "But on the other hand, I don't want my Facebook profile to be listed on Google searches, because not everyone on the World Wide Web needs to know who I am."

Norris referenced a feature recently added to www.google.com - the search engine that now owns Facebook.com - that lists Facebook profiles that match search inquiries.

But the difference between listing personal information on Web sites like Facebook and online student directories is slight, said Todd Cohen, University of Kansas relations officer.

"We encourage students to be aware of the information they do - or do not - put out there," Cohen said. "Learning to care for your identity is something to do while you're in college."

While students are aware of the non secure nature of online student directories, they appreciate the service it offers, said Kyle Cranston, senior in architectural engineering and president of American Society of Heating, Refrigerating and Air-Conditioning Engineers.

"I'm part of a lot of organizations with members that need to get my contact information," Cranston said. "If someone needs to get a hold of me, it's all there on the People pages."

"I used it yesterday to confirm the accuracy of our member information, so I guess you could say I was using stalker net for the opposite reason it got that name."

FRIDAY FACTOID

Numerous K-State student body presidents now prominent figures

The Friday Factoid takes a look at past student body presidents who are now prominent figures. Questions concerning historical information, news that was not covered or anything you want to know are welcomed. Please e-mail questions to collegian@ksu.edu.

Have there been any prominent K-State student body presidents?

Don't let his afro fool you. Sam Brownback was a politician, even in college.

Brownback, a U.S. senator from Kansas and 2008 presidential candidate, served as student body president during the 1978-79 school year.

During his term as president, Student Senate approved the construction of Bramlage Coliseum.

Brownback originally proposed the stadium contain 17,000 seats, but when it was constructed in 1988, Bramlage had only 14,000 seats.

Other prominent figures have served as student body presidents. Pat Bosco, dean of student life, served as president during the 1970-71 school year. According to a May 13, 2004, Collegian article, Bosco said one of his main achievements was the introduction of course and teacher evaluations.

Jim Geringer, governor of Wyoming from 1995 to 2002, served as president during the 1966-67 school year. During his term, Student Senate made the first proposal for a new football stadium that would become Snyder Family Stadium.

Another prominent former president is Bernard

Franklin. Franklin was the first black student body president and won in 1975 as a write-in candidate. He was also the youngest person to be appointed to the Kansas

World-renowned Argentinean tango group to perform at McCain Auditorium

By Elise Podhajsky
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Sunday night promises to be passionate, sexy, provocative and exciting in McCain Auditorium, a McCain official said.

Thom Jackson, McCain marketing and development director, said Tango Buenos Aires, a world-renowned and original Argentinean tango performance group, will heat up the McCain stage at 7:30 p.m. Sunday.

Jackson said the show will involve five to seven musicians playing traditional tango instruments live on stage while a cast of 25 dancers show K-State they are truly masters at their craft.

McCain director Todd Holmberg said he expects the performance will be colorful, filled with breathtaking costumes and sets while talented dancers tango across the stage.

"The tango is so fun to watch because it's a very passionate and sensual art form," Holmberg said. "It requires the partners to be held very close together with perfect coordination between dancers, so it's visually stunning."

Jackson said the event, cosponsored by the Mid-American Arts Alliance, will help bring Latin culture to Manhattan. Expressing culture doesn't always have to be through lots of words and text; he said the tango, with its music, style and story-telling, is Argentina — all rolled into one event.

"We really try and reach out to the different ethnic cultures of our community," Jackson said. "I truly think this performance is important because it's students' golden opportunity to experience a whole different culture in one night."

The art of tango has been around for more than 100 years. It first started as a dance in peasant ballrooms and has escalated into what Jackson said is considered a classic art form today.

Holmberg said the name of the show will be "The Four Seasons." Each season will be represented by tango in the street, ballroom, city and theater. The final season, he said, will conclude with a "fiery grand finale."

"The tango is recognized as high performing art, just as ballet, jazz or classical music is," Holmberg said. "Tango Buenos Aires is just one of the series of world-class events we've brought to McCain to enhance the overall experience and learning opportunities here at K-State. We hope that by exposing the students and community to this, it will encourage a life-long love of all the arts."

Holmberg said he is anticipating the Sunday event. He said he thinks it will be quite a sight to behold the beautiful dancing and incredible live music paired with the elaborate costumes and sets.

"We'll be taken to another place in the world," he said, "and that's what I'm looking forward to."

Joyce Yagerline, associate professor of speech communication, theatre and dance, will give a pre-performance lecture at 6:30 p.m. in McCain 204.

In her 30-minute speech, Yagerline said she will briefly describe the Argentinean tango and give a short history of its background. Two dancers also will demonstrate a few tango steps while they are explained. If time permits, Yagerline said she will take the last five minutes of the lecture and ask volunteers to come down and experience the tango for themselves.

"The reason I like giving a pre-concert talk with live dancers is because it's a visual and educational process so people know what to look for when they go into the show," she said.

Yagerline said she believes there is nothing more exciting than live dance, which makes it more real.

"I encourage all students at K-State, as well as the community, to come out and support the arts," she said. "Let's all have a great time and enrich our lives through the arts."

Google sponsors $30 million 'Moon 2.0' contest to encourage space flight

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

LOS ANGELES — Google Inc. is bankrolling a $30 million contest that could significantly boost the commercial space industry and spur the first nongovernmental flight to the moon.

Call it Moon 2.0. The bulk of the prize will go to the first private company that can land a robotic rover on the moon and beam back a gigabyte of images and video to Earth, the Internet search leader said Thursday.

Google partnered with the X Prize Foundation for the moon challenge, which is open to companies around the world. The Santa Monica-based nonprofit prize institute is best known for hosting the Ansari X Prize contest, which led to the first manned private spaceflight in 2004.

The Google Lunar X Prize joins another prize already dangling in front of potential competitors: $50 million that hotel magnate Robert Bigelow is offering the first private American team to rocket a manned craft into orbit by 2010.

The race to the moon won't be easy or cheap. But whoever fills the requirements in the Google contest by the end of 2012 gets $20 million.

The winning spacecraft must be tough enough to survive a landing and be equipped with high-definition video and still cameras. And it must be smart enough to trek at least 1,312 feet on the moon and send self-portraits, panoramic views and near-real-time videos back to Earth that will be streamed on Google's Web site.

"I hope that a ... very ambitious team of people will allow us all to virtually go back to the moon very soon. I couldn't be more excited about that," Google co-founder Larry Page said at WIRED magazine's technology show in Los Angeles.

Participants must secure a launch vehicle for the probe, either by building it themselves or contracting with an existing private rocket company. Private rocket company Space X said it will subsidize use of its launch vehicle to interested competitors. The company, headed by PayPal co-founder Elon Musk, has not had a fully successful launch in two tries.

If there is no winner, the purse will drop to $15 million until the end of 2014, when the contest expires. There is also a $5 million second-place prize and $5 million in bonus money to teams that go beyond the minimum requirements.

At least one group has expressed interest. Famed roboticist William "Red" Whittaker of Carnegie Mellon University said he is putting together a team to build a lunar rover. Last year, Whittaker was in charge of two autonomous vehicles that competed in a robot race across the Mojave Desert.

The competition comes at a time of revived interest in lunar exploration among foreign governments since the Cold War space race. Government agencies in the United States, Europe and Asia are gearing up to return to the moon.

Japan's space agency, JAXA, plans to launch its long-delayed orbiter SELENE from a remote Pacific Island on Friday. NASA next year will rocket a lunar orbiter and impactor, the first of several lunar robotic projects before astronauts are sent to the moon next decade.

Government lunar missions can cost upward of hundreds of millions of dollars, but the X Prize Foundation and Google hope the private sector can do it for considerably less.

Space technology experts say a moon landing is achievable, but teams will face financial and regulatory hurdles. Chief among them is planning a mission that will be cheap enough to make the prize worthwhile.

"There's no reason why the private sector cannot band together and execute a lunar mission," said Paul Spudis, a lunar expert at Johns Hopkins University, who is building imaging radar for two upcoming government moon launches.

The partnership between Google and the X Prize Foundation comes as no surprise. Earlier this year, Page hosted a star-studded charity auction for the foundation at the company's Mountain View headquarters. Page is a trustee of the X Prize Foundation.

The Google Lunar X Prize announcement, also a flashy event, was attended by Apollo astronaut Buzz Aldrin and featured a video message by sci-fi film director James Cameron.

Google has had previous forays into space albeit via the Internet by launching Google Mars and Google Earth, Web browser-based mapping tools that give users an up-close, interactive view with the click of a mouse.

The X Prize Foundation is also holding competitions in rapid genetic decoding and creating super-efficient vehicles. But the moon prize is by far the largest in its 12-year history.

KNIFE | Man approaches 4 in Aggieville

the RCPD said.

One victim pointed to a police officer who had been standing at the other end of the alley.

Police said the suspect got back in his car and rapidly backed out of the alley. The officer then contacted a patrol car, which followed the Focus.

The vehicle headed north on Moro, shut off its lights after crossing Bluemont Avenue, turned east onto Thurston Street, where he finally pulled over and then ran on foot.

Police searched the area and eventually found Deleon.

Deleon was charged with two counts of aggravated assault, criminal use of a weapon, two counts of purchase and consumption of alcohol by a minor, reckless driving, driving under the influence, fleeing and attempting to elude a police officer, and unlawful transportation of liquor in open containers.

Former ABC News consultant allegedly faked prominent interviews

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

A former ABC News consultant fired last year because he couldn't authenticate academic credentials is at the center of a new dispute over apparently faked interviews with Barack Obama, Nancy Pelosi, Bill Gates and others.

The consultant, Alexis Debat, quit the Nixon Center, a Washington think tank, on Wednesday after Obama's representatives claimed an interview with the senator appearing under Debat's byline in the French magazine Politique Internationale never took place.

The interview quoted the Democratic presidential candidate as saying the Iraq war was "a defeat for America."

Pelosi, Gates, former Federal Reserve Chairman Alan Greenspan, former United Nations Secretary-General Kofi Annan and New York Mayor Michael Bloomberg all said they never gave interviews that appeared in the magazine under Debat's byline, ABC News'

Web site, the Blotter, reported on Thursday.

Debat acknowledged to The Associated Press on Thursday that he never conducted any of the interviews published under his byline. He said he hired another reporter, Rob Sherman, to conduct the Obama interview. He said he translated the remarks and sent them in to the French journal, which published it under Debat's byline.

No one immediately responded to a message left at what Debat said was Sherman's phone number.

In the other cases, Debat said he drafted questions for the political figures for Politique Internationale. The magazine sent back "answers" that he translated, wrote an introduction for and sent back with his byline, he said.

"They do some weird things over there," he said.

The magazine's editor, Patrick Wajzman, did not return telephone calls Thursday from the AP, and other editors wouldn't comment. Wajzman told the Blotter that he was a victim in this case, and that Debat was "just sick."

When a user clicks on articles under Debat's byline on the Politique Internationale Web site, a blank screen appears.

The Blotter quoted a U.N. official as saying Wajzman was told in 2005 that the interview with Annan was faked.

A second "interview" with Annan posted earlier this year instead included portions of a speech he had made at Princeton University passed off as an interview, the Web site said.

Debat had been a consultant at ABC News since shortly after the 2001 terrorist attacks, reporting on terrorism issues, said Brian Ross, chief of ABC News' investigative unit.

In May, ABC was contacted by the French embassy and told to check on Debat's credentials. Debat had claimed to have a doctorate from the Sorbonne, but ABC could not verify this. He was fired and ABC began looking back at Debat's work to see if anything was false.

They found no evidence of incorrect material, said Ross, adding that most of the information Debat provided was verified by others.

Debat said his Ph.D. had been held up on technicalities and that he had completed all the required work. He said he believed someone in the French government was out to get him because they didn't like his work on ABC.

Debat has been extensively quoted by other media, including the AP, which included his remarks in three stories.

He was identified as a terrorism consultant in a 2004 story about CIA Director George Tenet's resignation and quoted as saying Tenet had a reputation as a yes-man for President Bush.

And he was quoted twice in 2001, identified as a former French Defense Ministry analyst. In one story, he said the United States and France has increased their intelligence-sharing.

He was the main source for the second story, in which he said police had found a notebook with codes that could help decipher messages within Osama bin Laden's terrorist network.

The AP has started investigating whether the information provided by Debat was accurate.

A duty officer at the Defense Ministry could not immediately confirm Thursday night whether Debat had worked for the ministry.

Since the revelations about the fabricated interviews, ABC News also is going back again to check over Debat's work, sending people to Pakistan and Europe, Ross said.

"We're working hard to make sure that everything he was involved in that we reported stands up," Ross said, "and if it doesn't, we'll report it immediately."

Authorities dismiss Fossett kidnapping, fleeing theories

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

RENO, Nev. — Authorities investigating the disappearance of millionaire adventurer Steve Fossett said Thursday they've ruled out some of the more unlikely explanations for why they haven't found his plane, including the possibility he wanted to vanish.

No trace has been found of his single-engine plane despite a small air force that has scoured the canyons and hillsides along the Sierra Nevada's eastern front for 11 days, raising the prospect that he's just not there.

Rich, famous and apparently happy in his pursuits of adventure, Fossett had been flying on a scouting mission for a dry lake bed to attempt to break the land speed record.

Could he have grown tired of the limelight and wanted to start a new life? Could he have fled some personal or financial problems? "We have looked at that," Lyon County Undersheriff Joe Sanford told The Associated Press on Thursday.

"We have assets that are tracking financial records, credit card transactions, cell phone use," he said, noting they have not received any calls claiming sightings of Fossett.

"With his notoriety, we believe he couldn't walk away from this type of event," he said. "People would recognize him."

Investigators also dismiss the notion that Fossett met foul play or was kidnapped to be held for ransom.

"If we find a wreck area, we will need to treat that like a crime scene before we rule out foul play," Nevada Highway Patrol Trooper Chuck Allen said. "But there's no reason to think about that now."

A longtime prosecutor in neighboring Washoe County said the normal course of an investigation would include at least a brief look into even the most unlikely scenarios.

"I have no idea about Mr. Fossett, but I know that it has happened in the past where we have had guys just disappear and stage things," Washoe County District Attorney Richard Gammick said.

"When you can't find individuals for an extended period of time, you would have to look at everything."

But Gammick thinks it's much more likely that Fossett's plane simply went down in a rugged canyon, or perhaps a lake, where searchers haven't found him and perhaps never will.

High winds kept most search planes grounded Thursday. Ground crews returned to a spot in the Pine-nut Mountains in western Nevada where two witnesses reported seeing a plane like Fossett's fly into a canyon, but not out, on Labor Day. About 80 percent of the area has been searched, Civil Air Patrol Maj. Ed Locke said.

"There are no new major leads today," Sanford said late Thursday afternoon.

To the south, just across the California line, crews finished searching an area northeast of Yosemite National Park. California law officers met Thursday with a woman who reported a day earlier that she had camped there over Labor Day and had heard a noise that sounded like an airplane, followed by what sounded like an explosion. A plane found nothing during a flyover Wednesday.

"They did a pretty good extensive search ... and they didn't come up with anything," Alpine County Sheriff John Crawford said.

For four years, I attended an all-girls Catholic high school.

It might sound like a sorority on steroids or nearly every man's secret fantasy, but to me and my all-female classmates, it was simply St. Teresa's Academy.

Despite the impassioned rumors of tickle fests, naked pillow fights and lesbian action, this type of school activity was sparse, if there was any at all.

It was high school. We were there to learn, to make friends and to have fun.

Whereas many naïve or ignorant people claimed they couldn't imagine going to a single-sex school, for us STAers, it was life, and it was fine.

For the first few weeks, school is awkward for most new people. But at STA, instead of determining whom the hottest and most popular guys were, we ladies learned to let go of our natural hostility toward each other and find ways to bond.

What probably irked me the most during high school and even still today is the ignorant stereotyping of all-girls schools.

1. I'm not a lesbian, nor were 90 percent of my classmates.
2. We wore knee socks to keep warm, not to catch the attention of wandering eyes.
3. We hemmed and cropped our skirts not to be sexy, but rather to keep the rough polyester blend from touching our skin.
4. My school was not a detention center for "bad girls."
5. Yes, we had a handful of nuns at school, and yes, they might have carried around a few rulers in their time. But they were more likely to measure the lengths of our socks to assure they were regulation height than to pull any martial-law tricks.

Almost as annoying as any stereotypes were the misconceptions and underestimations of what took place on campus. Regardless of popular thought, STA classrooms aren't cesspools for strong-headed feminists. We learned to appreciate both genders and regard them as equals.

If I had a dollar for every time someone has said "I could never go to an all-girls school. I hate other girls, and I have way too many guy friends. I couldn't survive without guys around," I would be doing something much more prolific than journalism.

Believe it or not, sister, as someone who also thought she could not live without guys or be forced to wear a uniform, it's completely and pleasantly doable.

In the single-sex environment, students are able to focus their attention more on learning, and especially in all-girls schools, students have more self-confidence and are more likely to speak up in class. It isn't because STA is Catholic-based or private that makes the experience so worthwhile. It is the comfortable and accepting environment that makes learning and achieving so conducive.

If I had to do high school all over again, I would definitely go to a single-sex school. It's amazing how much more you can take in and learn when members of the opposite sex are out of the room. Besides, there are plenty of weekends and mixers to meet boyfriends.

K-State student named 2007 Mr. Gay Kansas Strip-Off

By Wendy Haun
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Xcalibur Club in Junction City welcomed gay men stripping to their boxers. The event raised $456 for the Regional AIDS Project on Aug. 22. Matthew Combes, junior in social work, was crowned at the seventh-annual Mr. Gay Kansas Strip-Off. Combes sat down with the Collegian to talk about the experience and what it meant to him.

Talk a little bit about the experience.

It's kinda crazy. It's not every day that you're in front of people, taking your clothes off. I'm not exactly what you would think of as a stripping kind of person. I'm scrawny. The most interesting thing was that one of my friends took a video so I can look back and see how ridiculous I looked in it.

Q. How many years have you been doing the competition?

A. This is the first year that I competed. Last year, I attended and saw it and thought I wanted to do it. A bunch of people that I worked with told me I had no choice.

Q. Was it awkward?

A. It was really awkward. If I had known no one in the audience, it would have been easier. I had friends, coworkers, one of my bosses and people that I do workshops and groups with were in the audience. My partner was sitting in the audience. Here I am, trying to strip and having people give me tips, and he's sitting there.

Q. Have you ever done anything similar to this?

A. On Friday nights at Xcalibur, they have an underwear fashion show. On a whim last year, I went out there, and a friend convinced me I had to compete. It's an every-Friday event, and you model whatever underwear you happen to be wearing, and if you win, you get a $20 bar tab. I actually won, but I gave the bar tab to my friend because I'm not of age to drink.

Q. Did it have an effect on you, that you're doing this for a worthy cause?

A. It really did. I actually work at the Regional AIDS Project. I'm in an outreach project, and I work with the gay and lesbian community. It really got me out there and to have more fun with it.

Q. What was the most fun about doing this event?

A. Part of the judging is they judge you on several things: physique, audience interaction and overall appeal. They also have this thing called the X-factor – the unique way to impress the crowd and the judges. I'm known by my friends and coworkers as Mr. Gumby because I'm a contortionist. It was really fun because after doing the splits and doing back bends, it was just fun getting to be wacky and crazy.

Q. Will you do it again in the future?

A. Heck yeah. Next year, I can't compete. I'll have to be there to pass on the honor to the next individual. But in two years, I'll compete again.

Q. Is AIDS awareness something you want to do after you graduate?

A. One of the coolest things that I can continue to do is HIV-AIDS prevention. I work with the Regional AIDS Project. I'm the vice president of Sexual Health Awareness Peer Educators (president of ICAN, which is a new group on campus that deals with SHAPE and the Regional AIDS Project. We work together to plan AIDS Awareness Week. I'm also on a state board planning group where we help write and approve policy from the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention on AIDS awareness and prevention.

FIGHTING BACK

For years Division I-AA teams were a wing in the wind of the bigger I-A schools. But this year, three notable victories have shown that the smaller schools can indeed play with the big boys.

OFF THE FIELD | CENTER JORDAN BEDORE

Jordan Bedore might be 6-foot-3 and 308 pounds, but there is a lot more to him than his size. The junior center from Goodland, Kan., comes from an athletic family. His father was a collegiate baseball player, and his mother played volleyball in college. Bedore's cousin, Jesse Woodard, played tight end at K-State in 1997. Bedore recently answered questions ranging from his biggest pet peeve to his favorite Web site.

Q. What NFL player do you model your game after?

A. I'd probably say Nick Mangold from the Jets because he just got drafted recently. He's the one that I've kept an eye on the most.

Q. What's your biggest pet peeve?

A. I have to be early to everything. I'm usually about 20 minutes early because I don't like feeling rushed. Being late isn't my thing.

Q. What's your least favorite part of practice?

A. I don't like getting dressed. It takes about 10 or 15 minutes. I just don't like it.

Q. What's the worst reality show you'll admit to watching?

A. "Flavor of Love." I've seen all of the seasons.

Q. What star would you like to dance with?

A. Probably Jennifer Aniston; I like her in "Friends."

Q. What's the closest thing you have to a famous relative?

A. My cousin Jesse Woodard played tight end here in 1997 and my sister starts for the South Carolina volleyball team.

Q. What's the last gadget you bought?

A. I just bought a PSP last week. I have MLB Baseball and Tiger Woods 2008. I don't have any movies yet, though.

Q. What's your favorite Web site to visit?

A. I'm not sure if I have a favorite, but I probably get on Facebook the most.

Q. What's the last CD you bought or downloaded?

A. The last CD I bought was Lynyrd Skynyrd's Greatest Hits. It's my favorite band.

Q. Who is your hero?

A. My grandfather is my hero. Growing up on the farm with him, he showed me how to work hard.

Q. What's your favorite pre-game meal?

A. We always have the same meal, so just a baked potato, steak, chicken and pasta.

KANSAS STATE

MISSOURI STATE

OFFENSE

With 425 yards of offense last week and the rebirth of a running attack, K-State's offense made giant leaps from the first game. Running back James Johnson's 111 yards were a big improvement from his 14 at Auburn. Josh Freeman made positive strides as well, completing 69 percent of his passes. For the Wildcats to continue their development, they must limit turnovers.

Missouri State brings in the No. 1 scoring offense in all of Division I-AA (56.5 points per game) but has yet to play a I-A team this season. The Bears last played a I-A team when they lost to Oklahoma State 52-10 in 2006. Missouri State runs the ball well out of a spread offense, which K-State has struggled to stop over the past few years. The Bears have six players averaging 5.7 yards per carry or better.

DEFENSE

K-State's front seven will probably look to take advantage of Missouri State's inexperienced offensive line (one senior) by mixing up blitzes. The 3-4 front is supposed to be more capable of handling the spread offense. This will be the first test and could prepare it for Big 12 Conference teams that spread it out. K-State also needs to limit the penalties.

The Bears gave up 542 total yards and 44 points against Tennessee-Martin. They still won, but that kind of defensive effort against K-State will not be acceptable. There's a lot of room for improvement, particularly in the pass rush. Missouri State has recorded just two sacks so far this season. Consistent pressure in the backfield will be key in the Bears' hopes to slow down the K-State offense.

SPECIAL TEAMS

So far the K-State kicking game has been solid. Kicker Brooks Rossman has hit all four field goals and Tim Reyer is averaging a stellar 44.5 yards per punt. It's the return game that needs some work. Last year's No. 1 kickoff-return unit in the nation is now last in the Big 12, and that's an area coach Ron Prince made clear he wants to improve.

Special teams is the area where underdogs on the road can swing momentum. That means Missouri State needs to improve quickly. The Bears rank 108th in Division I-AA in punt returns and 46th in kick returns. Nathan Stokes, the team's kicker and punter, booted a 44-yard field goal last week and led his conference in punting in 2006 with a 42.8-yard average.

PREDICTION

We won't be seeing any repeats of Appalachian State this weekend. Talent and ability will take center stage, with the Wildcats overpowering the Bears. The lower-division status of Missouri State will show, and the Wildcats will soon look forward to Texas.

—LINEBACKER REGGIE WALKER

After upsets, numerous I-AA teams no longer considered 'cupcakes'

By Ryne Witt
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The questions came at Monday's press conference — as the K-State players knew they would — about whether or not they'd overlook Division I-AA opponent Missouri State on Saturday.

Would the Wildcats, two games removed from their season opener against SEC power Auburn, be able to get up for their matchup against a team considered by many to be on a lesser scale?

K-State has played these "lesser" teams before, most notably in last year's season opener against Illinois State — a Division I-AA school from the same Gateway Conference Missouri State hails from.

Many thought the game would be a tune-up, a chance for K-State to get coach Ron Prince's regime off to a roaring start.

That game ended with a slim one-point victory over the Redbirds, a far cry from the blowout most fans were expecting.

Another reminder of the potential of I-AA teams came two weeks ago. Appalachian State, a team from the Southern Conference, went on the road and beat Michigan, shocking the nation.

The win didn't catch Prince by surprise. He played at Appalachian State in the early 1990s and later spent time as an assistant at three different I-AA schools. Prince said he knows there are great players at that level, which is why he always has treated the Illinois State win as a significant victory.

"I told them that was a great win for us," Prince said. "At the time people thought I was a little bit crazy, but that's a team that had been together, had a great coaching staff."

Now times appear to be changing, as I-AA teams are

MISSOURI STATE (2-0)

Location: Springfield, Mo.
Year founded: 1905
Enrollment: 20,962
Nickname: Bears
School colors: Maroon and white Conference: Gateway (Division I-AA)
Head coach: Terry Allen (second year)
Allen all-time vs. K-State: 1-5
Last season: 2-9
Notable: Missouri State is 0-5 all-time vs. Big 12 opponents since the league's inception in 1996. The Bears have lost three times to Oklahoma State and twice to Kansas. Though these two teams have never met, this won't be K-State's first exposure to the Gateway Conference. The Wildcats have played 12 games against the GFC, holding a 9-3 record.

beginning to hold their own with schools from the top division. The Appalachian State win, for instance, is considered by some to be the greatest upset ever.

Other I-AA schools, like Northern Iowa and Southern Illinois — both of the Gateway Conference — also have pulled off upsets.

Do these recent results suggest the competitive gap between the two levels is shrinking? According to Prince, yes.

"I think, in the general public, there's so much made of recruiting that you feel at certain levels, they have all the good players and the other team doesn't," he said. "That's not true."

With the gap between the two divisions seemingly decreasing, perhaps the term "cupcake" — in reference to some I-AA teams — finally can be put to rest.

"You can't take a team lightly anymore," senior Jordy Nelson said.

One coach known for Missouri State running back Gerald Davis sheds a few tackles. Davis and the undefeated Bears are averaging 320.5 rushing yards per game.

setting up games against I-AA teams was Prince's predecessor, Bill Snyder. He scheduled 12 I-AA teams during his 17-year stint, and in 2003 and 2004, he played two I-AA opponents in his non-conference schedule. After losing the first in 1989, Snyder won the next 11.

Missouri State will try to put an end to that streak on Saturday, and if it does, it would be the third upset for the Gateway this season.

"They're used to winning," Prince said. "They believe they can win."

The main difference between the two divisions is the number of scholarships allotted to the schools. K-State's scholarship limit is 85 while Missouri State's is 63.

However, K-State players don't intend to let that change their mentality toward preparation for Missouri State. Otherwise, history has a chance at repeating itself.

"Typically people try to say, 'Oh, they're a I-AA — they're going to be a pushover,'" linebacker Reggie Walker said. "But that's when they lose."

BIG 12 VS. I-AA OPPONENTS IN 2007

The Big 12 Conference has eight teams facing Division I-AA opponents this year, and has gone 2-1 in the games so far. The only schools not to go up against a I-AA team are Texas, Oklahoma, Colorado and Nebraska.

Big 12 Team	I-AA Opponent	Result/Date
Baylor	Texas State	Sept. 15
Iowa State	Northern Iowa	Northern Iowa 24-13
Kansas	SE Louisiana	Kansas 62-0
K-State	Missouri State	Sept. 15
Missouri	Illinois State	Sept. 22
Oklahoma State	Sam Houston State	Sept. 22

BIG 12 UPDATE

BAYLOR BEARS (1-1)

Week two result: 42-17 win vs. Rice.

What went right: Blake Szymanski broke a school record with 412 passing yards and six touchdowns. Twelve different Baylor receivers caught a pass. Baylor jumped out to a 21-7 lead in the first quarter and never looked back.

What went wrong: The Bears allowed Rice quarterback Chase Clement to complete 20 of 25 passes (80 percent) for 207 yards. That doesn't bode well for the future when Baylor has to go up against far more superior passing offenses in Big 12 conference play.

Week three outlook: This weekend the Bears will be host to Division I-AA Texas State, a school most famous for its role in the 1991 film, "Necessary Roughness." Luckily for Baylor, Texas State doesn't have Sinbad on the defensive line or Kathy Ireland nailing clutch field goals.

COLORADO BUFFALOES (1-1)

Week two result: 33-14 loss at Arizona State.

What went right: In the first quarter, the Buffaloes led 14-0 on a 35-yard interception return for a touchdown and an end-zone strike from Cody Hawkins to Scotty McKnight. Colorado held its own with a legitimate Pac 10 Conference team for a while but was overmatched in the end.

What went wrong: Arizona State settled down after the first and dominated from that point. Hawkins completed just 15 of 42 passes – not exactly an ideal completion percentage.

Week three outlook: The Buffaloes' tough schedule continues as they square off against Florida State at home. The Seminoles – ranked No. 19 to begin the season – got their first win of the season against UAB last week. This is the first of a home-and-home series that concludes next season in Tallahassee, Fla.

IOWA STATE CYCLONES (0-2)

Week two result: 24-13 loss vs. Northern Iowa.

What went right: As bad as this was, Iowa State did actually have more total offense than the Panthers.

Quarterback Bret Meyer – with 305 total yards – didn't have much trouble moving the ball; the Cyclones just had four costly turnovers.

What went wrong: A Division I-AA team losing to a Division I-AA team is usually a surprise, except when it's Iowa State. The Cyclones disappointed the largest crowd ever at Jack Trice Stadium (56,795) by snapping a five-game win streak against their in-state rivals.

Week three outlook: Another in-state team comes to Ames, but this one is definitely more formidable – Iowa. The Big 10 Conference foe has won three of the last four in the series with the Cyclones, and it's not likely that trend will end this year. Not when Iowa State can't beat Kent State or Northern Iowa.

KANSAS JAYHAWKS (2-0)

Week two result: 62-0 win vs. Southeastern Louisiana.

What went right: Kansas out-gained the lowly Lions 501-75 in its most lopsided win since a 71-14 blowout of Cal-Northridge in 1999. Quarterback Todd Reesing led the attack with 257 yards and two touchdowns. The defense posted its first shutout since 2000.

What went wrong: Kansas was penalized three times for 15 yards. That's probably not really a problem, but when you play a team as poor as Southeastern Louisiana – picked to finish last in the Southland Conference – there's not likely to be many negatives.

Week two outlook: The Jayhawks will take on Toledo for the second time in as many years. Kansas lost last season's matchup 37-31 in double overtime. Toledo lost 52-31 to Central Michigan last week, a team Kansas beat 52-7 in the season-opener.

KANSAS STATE WILDCATS (1-1)

Week two result: 34-14 win vs. San Jose State.

What went right: The Wildcats didn't take the Spartans lightly, and it resulted in a controlling victory. Quarterback Josh Freeman had his first touchdown pass since the win over Texas last season. Wide receiver Deon Murphy had 188 all-purpose yards and two touchdowns.

What went wrong: There were lots of flags – again. K-State was penalized nine times for 96 yards, and some of them were really costly. Freeman threw two more picks, giving him 19 interceptions and seven touchdowns in his career.

Week three outlook: The Wildcats welcome Division I-AA Missouri State to Manhattan. It might be more of a test for the defense than most think. The Bears have won 62-17 over Missouri-Rolla and 51-44 at Tennessee-Martin. That said, Tennessee-Martin is no K-State.

MISSOURI TIGERS (2-0)

Week two result: 38-25 win at Ole Miss.

What went right: Quarterback Chase Daniel led five consecutive drives that ended in touchdown passes. Daniel has been awfully impressive so far, throwing for 689 yards in the first two weeks. Tony Temple carried 17 times for 123 yards.

What went wrong: It appears every game might be a shootout for the Tigers this season. The defense gave up 534 yards, including 226 on the ground from Rebel running back BenJarvus Green-Ellis. This unit needs to find a way to stop the bleeding, or the conference schedule could be difficult.

Week three outlook: After beating two BCS conference schools, Missouri will now face two teams from weaker conferences at home. The first test is Western Michigan, which might not be such a cupcake. The Broncos were picked to finish first in the MAC, but they did lose to Indiana at home last week.

NEBRASKA CORNHUSKERS (2-0)

Week two result: 20-17 win at Wake Forest.

What went right: The Nebraska defense bailed out the turnover-prone offense on multiple occasions. Wake Forest had a chance to tie or take the lead in the fourth quarter, but Nebraska's Zack Bowman intercepted a pass in the end zone.

What went wrong: After rushing for 413 yards against Nevada in week one, the Huskers managed just 27 yards on the ground. Quarterback Sam Keller was responsible for some costly turnovers, including one interception at his own 10-yard line.

Week three outlook: The going gets quite a bit tougher for the Huskers, who face No. 1 USC at home. Nebraska will have to play a near-perfect game to beat the Trojans. That means no more untimely interceptions from Keller. USC has had two full weeks to prepare for the trip to Lincoln, Neb.

OKLAHOMA SOONERS (2-0)

Week two result: 51-13 win vs. Miami.

What went right: Quarterback Sam Bradford continued to impress, tying a school record with five touchdown strikes. In the first two weeks the redshirt freshman has completed 40 of 48 passes for 568 yards and eight touchdowns. Malcolm Kelly caught three of the scores.

What went wrong: In a dominating performance, the only disappointments came on a few special-teams miscues. One punt snap went over Michael Cohen's head, resulting in a Miami field goal. Kicker Garrett Hartley also botched an extra point.

Week three outlook: Oklahoma will look to keep things rolling with its game at home against Utah State. They're looking like legitimate national title contenders. As for the Utah State Aggies – well, they probably won't be contending for much this season, or any other season for that matter.

OKLAHOMA STATE COWBOYS (1-1)

Week two result: 42-6 win vs. Florida Atlantic.

What went right: Oklahoma State's high-powered offense found its groove, totaling 488 yards. Backup quarterback Zac Robinson threw for 250 yards and three touchdowns, two of which went to Adarius Bowman. The defense allowed only 28 yards rushing.

What went wrong: Starting quarterback Bobby Reid went missing. Not really, but Reid didn't play after the first quarter and the team spokesman didn't immediately know the reason for his absence.

Week three outlook: Oklahoma State returns to the South to play Troy. The Cowboys will hope for more success than they had in their first trip – a 35-14 loss at Georgia. Troy is 0-2 this season and has given up 105 total points in the losses. It could turn into a shootout in Alabama.

TEXAS LONGHORNS (2-0)

Week two result: 34-13 win vs. TCU.

What went right: The Longhorns woke up at halftime and outscored the Horned Frogs 34-3 after the break. The defense was superb, holding TCU to just 32 yards and no first downs in the third quarter after Texas took control.

What went wrong: McCoy threw two first-half interceptions, one of which was returned by Torrey Stewart 45 yards for TCU's lone touchdown. That continued the Longhorns' poor stretch to open the season after scraping past Arkansas State in the opener.

Week three outlook: Texas hits the road for the first time this season, traveling to Central Florida. The Knights shouldn't be taken too lightly – they won 25-23 at North Carolina State in their only game so far this season. The Longhorns seem to have finally awakened, though.

TEXAS A&M AGGIES (2-0)

Week two result: 47-45 3OT win vs. Fresno State.

What went right: The Aggies' defense stepped up when it needed to, forcing a Fresno State incompletion on the two-point conversion in the third overtime. Javorskie Lane steamrolled for 121 yards and four touchdowns, and he also provided the game-winning two-point conversion.

What went wrong: A&M blew a 19-point lead. Forgotten in the dramatic victory was the fact that the supposedly stout Aggie defense gave up 45 points after halftime. Stephen McGee's passing was ineffective, totaling just 79 yards on 24 attempts.

Week three outlook: The Aggies are probably hoping the next one won't be such a nail biter. A&M gets UL-Monroe at home. The Warhawks – from the Sun Belt Conference – have been outscored 84-43 in two losses this season.

TEXAS TECH RED RAIDERS (2-0)

Week two result: 45-31 win vs. UTEP.

What went right: The offense dominated for a second-straight week. Graham Harrell threw for 484 yards and four touchdowns. Redshirt freshman Michael Crabtree – Harrell's new favorite wide receiver – finished with 15 catches for 188 yards and two scores.

What went wrong: The Red Raiders got off to slow start again. They trailed 21-7 after the first quarter and 28-17 at halftime. The defense couldn't really stop whatever UTEP called, giving up 215 yards on the ground and 216 through the air.

Week three outlook: The patsy schedule continues for Texas Tech, which plays at Rice. Harrell has posted a career high in completions (now 48) in back-to-back games. With coach Mike Leach's play calling, 50 completions won't be out of the question against the Owls.

Team will miss Moore’s speed after injury ends his season

By Wendy Haun
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

It wasn’t easy for K-State linebacker Justin Roland to watch as his teammate and lifelong friend, Antwon Moore, lay on the turf at Snyder Family Stadium last Saturday.

The two grew up together, playing high-school football in Ponca City, Okla., and also attended the same junior college at Northeast Oklahoma A&M University.

Moore injured himself after sacking San Jose State quarterback Adam Tafralis, an apparent left-knee injury that coach Ron Prince said would keep him out for the rest of the season.

Not only did the injury mean the obvious, that K-State would be without one of its top defensive contributors as Big 12 Conference play looms ahead. It also meant that Roland, a senior, was going to have to play without his good friend for the first time in a long time.

“Being a friend to him and knowing him my whole life has been the most difficult (part of this),” Roland said. “It’ll hurt our team because it brought a whole new dynamic to our defense.”

Though Roland thought Moore was due for a breakout year, he said his teammate, who had sacks in consecutive games for K-State to open the season, was doing a good job of keeping a positive outlook.

“He’s keeping his spirits up,” he said. “He’s ready to start that recovery road to coming back. He’s down about it, obviously, but he’ll be back.”

In K-State’s season opener at Auburn, a 23-13 loss at Jordan-Hare Stadium, the 5-foot-10, 210-pound Moore showed promise. He recorded three tackles and a sack, using his speed to make plays in the Wildcats’ new 3-4 defensive alignment.

He was heading for an equally impressive day against San Jose State. Until the injury, anvwav.

“Antwon’s brought a lot of energy to us,” Prince said. “He had a big role defensively. This year, we expanded his role. We could all see that he played with a certain speed. We’ll miss him, no question.”

With Moore now on the sideline, the rest of K-State’s defensive unit knows it has to step up. While players didn’t necessarily suggest they’d be lost without him, they certainly understood the significance of him not being in the lineup.

“Coming off the edge, (Moore is) just a terror,” inside linebacker Reggie Walker said. “It’s going to hurt a lot.”

The focus now shifts to finding a replacement.

“We’ve got to figure out who we’ve got to fill in so we can get back on our feet,” sophomore linebacker Eric Childs said.

Emerging among the leading candidates to fill Moore’s spot is junior linebacker Chris Patterson. Patterson, described by the K-State media guide as a “fast and physical linebacker with freakish athletic ability,” had one tackle in the game at Auburn.

A native of Chicago and transfer from Joliet Junior College, Patterson also attended Northeast Oklahoma A&M as a freshman. Prince said in the first two games, Patterson already has started to improve.

“I’m very impressed,”

Prince said. “He made a big step from week one to week two. He played fast. He played like the player we knew. I think he’s still got improvement to come but with the outside back position with Ian (Campbell) and Eric; they’re getting a lot of action and doing a nice job for us.”

Though Prince declined to announce who would replace Moore, he said this was a chance for someone to step in for the team.

“When one door closes, another one opens up,” Prince said. “There’s an opportunity for someone else to show what they can do. We’re going to be looking towards that this week.”

Senior linebacker Antwon Moore goes in for the sack on San Jose State quarterback Adam Tafralis. Moore injured his left knee during the play and had to be assisted off the field by trainers team. Coach Ron Prince announced Monday that Moore will be sidelined for the rest of the season.

Expectations of Freeman too much

Josh Freeman has a cannon for an arm. Every one who has seen him play — either in high school or at K-State — knows that.

The sophomore quarterback showed his potential last season when he led his team to a monumental upset of Texas. It was a great moment for Freeman under the spotlight of the ESPN cameras.

However, it was also the moment people started throwing unrealistic expectations on the shoulders of the then-18-year-old. Some people forgot Freeman was still just a kid. He has some incredible talent — probably enough to make it to the NFL someday — but he is not a gift to football from the heavens above. He isn't a pro quarterback right now.

The two interceptions he threw against San Jose State were bad. Both of them were under-thrown, and he was locked onto Jordy Nelson for too long. But at least he was playing aggressively; you can't blame a player for that.

Much has been made of Freeman's less-than-exceptional touchdown-to-interception ratio. He has 19 interceptions and just seven touchdowns in his career — not exactly ideal.

But Freeman's statistics don't matter as long as he wins. If he finishes the year with more interceptions than touchdowns, but the team posts a 10-3 record, then who really cares?

It is not all about him.

Freeman is not capable of carrying this K-State team and he never will be — completely. No matter how good or bad a quarterback is, football is still a team game. That's why it's so great.

Freeman can only be as good as the pieces in place around him. And right now, those pieces are not quite good enough to take K-State to the promised land. That doesn't mean there isn't any talent there. It is just young and inexperienced talent.

The main weapons at Freeman's disposal are Nelson, the veteran wide receiver, and newcomer Deon Murphy, who has showed up with his "A" game. He has a potential future All-Big 12 tight end in sophomore Jeron Mastrud, who seems to catch pretty much everything thrown his way. Behind Freeman is James Johnson, who can be deadly if he gets to the edge, and Leon Patton, who is always a candidate to break a long run.

There are some playmakers, but there just aren't enough. After those five, Freeman is not getting much help, and five playmakers is not going to cut it in the world of college football.

However, there is some potential. Junior-college transfer Ernie Pierce, recently named a starter at wide receiver, has yet to prove himself. Freshman LaMark Brown has the build of a potential stud wide receiver, but he dropped the only pass thrown to him this year. The best tight end on the roster — Rashaad Norwood — is sitting on the bench because of legal troubles. And the offensive line is progressing, but it is still just OK and has room to grow.

Freeman still needs to grow with the young players around him. Just because he helped his team beat a top-5 opponent last season doesn't mean he deserves the Heisman Trophy. He still has two years left to play, and his game shows that.

The signature year for Freeman will not be 2007.

Next year could be that year. The line will be more experienced, and the skill-position players will be a year older and wiser. So just sit back and enjoy watching Freeman learn and improve this season. You never know, he might have a growth spurt in the middle of the season.

Each week, the Collegian will invite one Manhattan "celebrity" to make picks along with four writers. The guests' combined record will be listed throughout the season. This week's guest is Jeff Levin, co-owner of Varney's Bookstore.

KEYS TO VICTORY

1. ATTACK ON SPECIAL TEAMS

The Bears have returned only four punts this season — all by Eric Davis. Problem is, he has been running in the wrong direction. Davis is averaging minus-5.3 yards per return. Wildcats' punter Tim Reyer will be better off punting to Davis and letting him run backwards than attempting a coffin-corner punt.

2. KEEP TRACK OF BREHMER

Missouri State defensive end Chris Brehmer has recorded the team's only two sacks of the season. At 6-foot-5, 270 pounds, Brehmer is actually bigger than Josh Freeman, and he will be the main player the offensive line must keep in check.

3. CONTROL THE CHAINS

In just two games, the Bears have managed to move the chains 60 times — 19 more first downs than K-State. That can't happen Saturday. James Johnson and Leon Patton will need to control the ball by converting short-yardage situations and keeping the Bears' offense off the field.

4. GET THE CROWD INVOLVED

Missouri State players should have hearing damage after leaving Snyder Family Stadium.

With 40,000-plus screaming fans, Bears quarterback Matt Krapf shouldn't be audible or able to communicate with his teammates. It's time for the fans to wave those towels and create an environment the Bears have never seen before.

5. CONTAIN THE RUNNING GAME

Missouri State has rushed for 641 yards in just two games. Gerald Davis has 193 yards on 34 attempts (5.7 yards per carry). With linebacker Antwon Moore out for the season, this is the first chance for someone to step up and fill that void.

THIS WEEK

A look at events that occurred during this week in history, other bizarre holidays, happenings

TODAY 1862: BATTLE OF ANTIETAM

Beginning early on the morning of this day in 1862, Confederate and Union troops in the Civil War clashed near Maryland's Antietam Creek in the bloodiest one-day battle in American history. The Battle of Antietam marked the culmination of Confederate Gen. Robert E. Lee's first invasion of the Northern states. Guiding his Army of Northern Virginia across the Potomac River in early September 1862, the great general divided his men, sending half of them to capture the Union garrison at Harper's Ferry, under the command of General Thomas "Stonewall" Jackson.

President Abraham Lincoln put Major Gen. George B. McClellan in charge of the Union troops responsible for defending Washington, D.C., against Lee's invasion. McClellan's Army of the Potomac clashed first with Lee's men on Sept. 14, with the Confederates forced to retreat after being blocked at the passes of South Mountain. Though Lee considered turning back toward Virginia, news of Jackson's capture of Harper's Ferry reached him on Sept. 15. That victory convinced him to stay and make a stand near Sharpsburg, Maryland.

WEDNESDAY 1995: UNABOMBER MANIFESTO PUBLISHED

On this day in 1995, a manifesto by the Unabomber, an anti-technology terrorist, was published by the New York Times and Washington Post in hopes someone would recognize the person who, for 17 years, had sent homemade bombs through the mail that had killed and maimed innocent people around the United States.

THURSDAY 1973: KING TRIUMPHS IN BATTLE OF SEXES

On this day in 1973, in a highly publicized "Battle of the Sexes" tennis match, top women's player Billie Jean King, 29, defeated Bobby Riggs, 55, a former No. 1 ranked men's player.

Riggs (1918-1995), a self-proclaimed male chauvinist, had boasted that women were inferior, that they couldn't handle the pressure of the game and that even at his age he could beat any female player.

The match was a huge media event, witnessed in person by more than 30,000 spectators at the Houston Astrodome and by another 50 million TV viewers worldwide.

King made a Cleopatra-style entrance on a gold litter carried by men dressed as ancient slaves, while Riggs arrived in a rickshaw pulled by female models.

TUESDAY 1793: CAPITOL CORNERSTONE IS LAID

On this day in 1793, George Washington laid the cornerstone to the United States Capitol building, the home of the legislative branch of American government. The building would take nearly a century to complete, as architects came and went, the British set fire to it and it was called into use during the Civil War. Today, the Capitol building, with its famous cast-iron dome and important collection of American art, is part of the Capitol Complex, which includes six Congressional office buildings and three Library of Congress buildings, all developed in the 19th and 20th centuries.

As a young nation, the United States had no permanent capital, and Congress met in eight different cities, including Baltimore, New York and Philadelphia, before 1791.

FRIDAY 1780: ARNOLD COMMITS TREASON

On this day in 1780, during the American Revolution, U.S. Gen. Benedict Arnold met with British Maj. John Andre to discuss handing over West Point to the British, in return for the promise of a large sum of money and a high position in the British army. The plot was foiled, and Arnold — a former American hero — became synonymous with the word "traitor."

Arnold was born into a well-respected family in Norwich, Conn., on Jan. 14, 1741. He apprenticed with an apothecary and was a member of the militia during the French and Indian War (1754-1763). He later became a successful trader and joined the Continental Army when the Revolutionary War broke out between Great Britain and its 13 American colonies in 1775. When the war ended in 1783, the colonies won their independence from Britain and formed a new nation, the United States.

Tour visits sites from Underground Railroad

By Mayra Rivarola
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

About 60 people met at Triangle Park in Aggieville, loaded onto a school bus and traveled to another time in history.

The bus, with several cars following behind, headed out to Wabaunsee, Kan., for a tour of sites from the Underground Railroad. Richard Pitts led the Sunday afternoon tour, which was free of charge and open to the public.

Pitts is the author of "A Self-Guided Tour of the Underground Railroad in Kansas" and the executive producer of the documentary, "The Kansas Underground Railroad."

For Immanuel Lee, 11, taking part in the Underground Railroad Tour was a positive learning experience.

He said he had learned about the Underground Railroad in school but seeing the places would help him remember the information.

"What I'm trying to promote is historical memory, because we have to remember whose shoulders we're standing on in order to realize the benefits we have now," Pitts said.

Pitts said he has led this tour for 10 years and considers it important for Americans to understand their history and preserve the historical sites that surround them.

Wabaunsee, a town not far from Manhattan, is one of these sites that needs recognition, he said.

The town was founded by a group from Connecticut that came to Kansas with the goal of promoting an abolitionist movement, he said.

The tour bus stopped at a monument built "in memory of the Beecher Bible and Rifle Colony, which settled this area in 1856 and helped make Kansas a free state," according to a sign.

The members of this colony, which Pitts referred to as founders, came on a steamboat to Kansas.

"Because they came with a purpose, they decided they were going to do something fundamentally different," Pitts said.

These people did not agree with the slavery situation, so they started a war, Pitts said.

Enslaved blacks were treated as a commodity, he said, and even in the Constitution they were considered to be 3/5 of a human being. Since they were the sole source of labor to white slave owners, they were extremely valuable, and it was a large financial loss every time a slave escaped.

The federal government passed several laws that favored the slave owners, Pitts said. One such law was the second Fugitive Slave Law. It stated that if a slave owner decided to catch a slave who escaped, anyone who refused to help would be subject to lawsuits, fines or imprisonment.

"This made many people mad at the national government and the South," Pitts said. "The North was getting tired of being controlled by the South."

In 1854, with the Kansas-Nebraska Act, the people of Nebraska and Kansas had to decide if they were going to support the laws of the national government or the views of the abolitionists, Pitts said.

A fraudulent election took place in Kansas, and news spread that Kansas citizens were in favor of becoming a slave state, Pitts said. This was why Henry Beecher decided to move to Kansas. He became the leader of the Underground Railroad movement in Wabaunsee, organizing others who fought for the same cause.

After visiting the monument, the tour stopped at a school. This school reflected the high value the founders, who were highly educated people, placed on education, Pitts said.

"They believed that education is power, that information can be a very powerful tool," he said.

The church of Wabaunsee was also vital to the town's participation in the movement against slavery, Pitts said. It served as an Underground Railroad meeting station for runaway slaves on their way to freedom.

"The church served as a telephone to the town," he said. "Every time there was an emergency they would ring the bell and people would hurry to it."

Diversity Coordinator Tiffany Powell, a member of the planning committee and graduate student in curriculum and instruction, said it is the 19th year this tour has taken place.

The Underground Railroad Tour was part of Community Cultural Harmony Week, which has the objective of building a more diverse Manhattan.

Understanding history is a way this objective can be achieved, Pitts said.

"Each one of us are unique, but we all are Americans," he said. "We all have ugly parts of our history - we have to embrace them just like we embrace the nice parts. This is the only way we will get over racism."

Band Day provides opportunities for bands from Kansas high schools to work with each other, K-State Marching Band

By Salena Strate
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Spencer Bauman spent his 15th birthday playing trombone on Wagner Field in Snyder Family Stadium.

Bauman, a high-school freshman from Atchison, Kan., said the best part of his birthday was playing for his favorite team—K-State.

Twenty-six high-school bands traveled to Manhattan to participate in K-State's annual Band Day.

The high-school bands marched in a parade from Aggieville to the Manhattan Town Center and performed with the K-State Marching Band during Saturday's halftime.

Melanie Caster, senior in music education, said every high-school band worked with the marching band throughout the day.

"After the parade, they practice on the field with the K-State band," Caster said. "After that, they watch the game and perform the halftime with us."

During halftime, all bands performed a music with an "oldies" theme, ending with "Wildcat Victory."

Frank Tracz, director of bands, said the day went well.

"I've been here for 15 years now," Tracz said. "We've found a system, and now the bands coming in know what to expect and what to do. So believe it or not, everything runs pretty smoothly."

Tracz said Band Day at K-State is a tradition.

"I've seen pictures from back in the '50s of Band Day," Tracz said.

Olivia Cody, eighth grader from Ellis, Kan., traveled 3 1/2 hours to perform on Band Day. Cody said she was excited to perform because this was her first Band Day.

Since Ellis High School's high-school marching band has fewer members, junior-high school students also performed with the band, Cody said.

Aaron Edwards, band director from Atchison, Kan., said his 60-member band traveled 2 1/2 hours to perform. Edwards said the Atchison band receives a lot of support from its school district and community to come to K-State.

"The No. 1 reason to come is to get the kids out of the community and share their talents," he said. "Another reason is they get to see so many other bands; of course they get to see the K-State band play, but (they also see) so many bands that are on their same level."

A musician in the Marysville High School marching band performs as she marches down Poyntz Avenue in K-State's annual Band Day parade on Saturday. The parade ran from North Manhattan Avenue to the Manhattan Town Center.

HIT OR MISS | The editorial board selects Hit or Miss topics and writes them after a majority vote. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

HIT | BOSCO LOVES K-STATE

Dean Bosco gave a student who was carrying a lot of stuff a ride home this weekend. It's nice to have administrators at K-State who really care for students.

MISS | MISSING PILOT NOT FOUND

Rescue workers still have not found record-breaking pilot Steve Fossett after a two-week search which has cost $600,000. There are still rumors he was kidnapped or that he intentionally went missing.

HIT | BRIGGS GIVES ATHLETICS 2 MILLION

Briggs Automotive Group contributed $2.5 million to the K-State Athletics Department. This is the second-largest cash donation given to the department, and a club-level section of the stadium will be renamed because of the donation.

MISS | FIRST EXAMS

It seems too early, but the first round of exams this semester has already started. Hopefully students have been paying attention to what's happening in the classroom and not the weather outside it.

HIT | AFGHANISTAN PRESIDENT TO SPEAK

Hamid Karzai, the first democratically elected president of Afghanistan, will give the 150th Landon Lecture next week. It should be a great opportunity to learn more about how a young democracy works.

MISS | GLOOMY SATURDAY

The rain Saturday during Band Day at Snyder Family Stadium dampened what should have been a great day. Besides that, the nasty weather is just not good on the instruments.

Taking a stand

Governors challenge Bush on health insurance

Whenever a national politician wants to dodge an important question, he or she usually replies that the issue at hand should be left up to the individual states.

Whether it is gay marriage or stem-cell research, saying the states should decide is always a safe answer.

Unfortunately, a few states have tried to fix a significant problem the federal government has failed to act on—the problem of not providing health care to children—and the person standing in the way is President Bush.

Last week, the state of New York requested use of the State Children's Health Insurance Plan to help give health care to more of New York's children. However, Bush had other plans.

According to Bloomberg.com on Sept. 7, Bush rejected the state's request, because he claimed it did more than SCHIP originally intended. He claimed that allowing New York to offer assistance to some families who earn up to $82,000 would cause them to drop their private insurance plan.

Health care reform was a major stumping topic for Democrats last year, but as usual, nothing changed on the national level. So the states are doing what is necessary to give care to those who cannot afford it.

According to Bloomberg, in August the health department informed the states they had 12 months to prove 95 percent of children whose families earned twice as much as the poverty-level income were enrolled on SCHIP before the program could apply to other families.

The states claim this is a near impossible task, according to Bloomberg. But New York was not the only state to take matters into its own hands. New Jersey also had a request for expansion rejected, but Democratic Gov. John Corzine has said he will not obey the federal restrictions.

"I am deeply concerned about the devastating impact that this misguided policy will have on our efforts to address the growing problem of the uninsured," Corzine wrote to Bush in a letter, according to the Washington Post on Friday.

He is the first governor to openly challenge Bush on his new restrictions and has hinted he might seek to sue the federal government if a compromise is not made. Gov. Eliot Spitzer of New York has said the same.

It appears Bush cares more about the well being of an industry than he does about fixing the health care problem. And even when the states realize the national government has failed us once again, Bush stands in the way of progress.

We can only hope Spitzer and Corzine do not back down from going toe-to-toe with Bush the way we have seen Congress do so many times before. The federal government has had to step in to fix big problems before (see: rights, civil), but health care is something we cannot leave up to lobbyists and Washington insiders. It is time for all of us to be true "Republicans" and let our states solve a problem the feds seem unwilling to address.

Users should be wary of Facebook privacy

What happens on Facebook stays on Facebook – but not for long.

For three years, revolutionary social networking site Facebook.com has connected co-workers, classmates and friends, one mischievous poke at a time.

According to Web research company Alexa Internet, Inc., Facebook has garnered the status of being one of the top-10 Web sites used worldwide, snagging about 3.8 percent of the Internet population so far this month.

Branching from its original—and preferable—just-for-college online meet and greet, Facebook has set a standard for how the world interacts. More than 40 million people use the site, with about 30,000 on the K-State network alone.

As of early September, Facebook inventor Mark Zuckerberg and site engineer Philip Fung granted the ability to search for user profiles from the Facebook welcome page. In a few short weeks, any stalkerazzi will have the ability to search your pretty little profile picture in search engines like Google.

Watch out, K-State stalkernet, Facebook is giving you a run for your money.

Like any Web company making its millions, Zuckerberg and his team have put a lot on their plate—and it's much tastier than the Cup-of-Noodle bliss they were likely eating four years ago. Yet when a site as popular as this begins selling out and cashing in by sharing our profile information, shouldn't we have rights to maintain our anonymity?

Along with the site expansion, Facebook administrators give users the delusion of control. They tell us we can restrict our privacy settings on the site, despite the limited amount of personal information released to the public.

But what some fail to realize is just who can snag the latest details from your profile—it is not just your parents, future employers and significant others you should worry about.

You have a world of Web pervers and news media to consider.

In the case of Miss New Jersey, Amy Polumbo, we can bet many think differently about what they dish on the site, considering a few racy photos on Facebook nearly cost her the sparkly glitter on her cubic zirconia-crusted crown, according to July MSNBC reports.

However, along with the short-lived promise of keeping Facebook open just to college students, we should be skeptical of how long this information will be kept under wraps. After all, online competitor MySpace.com sold out to NewsCorp just last year.

Facebook could soon follow, with just about any company drooling over the details of your favorite movie, relationship status, the latest party you attended and if you are in the K-State group "I Want To Have Sex in the Library before I Graduate."

A March 2006 BusinessWeek article speculated Zuckerberg could be offered as much as $2 billion for his site, though the company's internal valuation is about $8 billion. It is only a matter of time before the Facebook team converts profiles into profit.

Facebook friends, let us face it, we are no longer in the land of privacy. While those cute little pokes might be adorable today, be wary of the information you release. You might just be poking away your right to privacy.

KansasStateCars.com commits to $2.5M donation to athletics

By Adrienne DeWeese
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A Web site featuring vehicles from dealers with a commitment to K-State athletics and the Alumni Association launched on Saturday.

KansasStateCars.com, an auto-shopping Web site for K-State alumni and friends, committed $2.5 million to the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics, representing the second-largest commitment in the department's history.

Russ Briggs, president of Briggs Automotive Group and fourth-generation K-State supporter, had the idea for the Web site, which took two years of planning.

"Today the 'what if' has become the 'what is,'" Briggs said Saturday during a press conference in the K-State Alumni Center ballroom.

Site visitors can search the database of new and pre-owned vehicles, e-mail questions to dealers, arrange test drives and register an account for free. More than two-thirds of buyers use the Internet to locate and research vehicles before purchase, according to the J.D. Power and Associates 2006 New autosshopper.com study.

When customers register with the Web site, they will receive a $200-off coupon toward their next vehicle purchase from one of the participating dealerships.

Customers receive several benefits after purchasing vehicles on the Web site, including Web site recognition, a $40 voucher toward Alumni Association membership, a key-chain, a license plate bracket and an auto badge.

Web site users do not have to live in Kansas to use the Web site, and participating dealers will work to arrange pickup or delivery of the purchased vehicles.

Nine franchises now are represented in the KansasStateCars.com network. KansasStateCars.com is a private organization that is not university-owned or operated.

"In the future, we will add industry partners to the site who share the same passion for K-State," Briggs said.

The 2,100-seat club section on the east side of Snyder

Family Stadium also has been renamed the KansasStateCars.com Club in recognition of the contribution. The section opened in 1999 as a part of the east stadium expansion project.

The Web site also includes a 10-year corporate sponsorship with the Alumni Association. The association will receive more than $300,000 for two programs—the Jr. Wildcat Club and pre-game celebrations at away football games, said Randy Rathbun, chair of the Alumni Association board of directors.

"Russ, there's about 155,000 K-State alumni, and I want to thank you on behalf of every one of them," Rathbun said.

The financial commitments will benefit future generations of K-State athletics and Alumni Association supporters, said Bob Krause, vice president for institutional advancement.

"I think it combines benefits that people will appreciate for years to come," Krause said. "You can't underestimate what one program like this can do."

Professor discusses book about Seuss

By Mark Wampler
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

"Dr. Seuss taught me how to read," said author Philip Nel, who spoke Sunday at the Manhattan Public Library.

Nel, an associate professor of English and director of the English department's graduate program in children's literature, talked about his new book, "The Annotated Cat: Under the Hats of Seuss and His Cats," published by Random House in 2007. The book was published in time for the 50th anniversary of Dr. Seuss' book, "The Cat in the Hat."

Nel has received considerable media attention for his new book, including spots on National Public Radio's "Talk of the Nation," CNN.com, and "CBS Sunday Morning," among others, according to a media release. He has been invited to lecture at numerous venues around the country and overseas.

Nel began his presentation by answering the question he said he knew was on everyone's mind: "Why does 'The Cat in the Hat' need to be annotated?"

"When we read, we interpret, and in 'The Annotated Cat,' I provide a variety of contexts in which we might interpret 'The Cat in the Hat,'" he said.

During the presentation, Nel referred to history, which provided context for Seuss' stories, as well as people whose work and lives influenced Seuss' work.

"In reading 'The Cat in the Hat' with this additional information, we gain more complex appreciation for the book and the man who wrote it," Nel said.

Nel spoke about early cartoons and advertisements from which Seuss gained inspiration and also the general ideas revealed within Seuss' work.

"He used his cultural capital as a famous author of children's books, not just to teach children to read but to put good ideas in their head," Nel said.

Though Nel said most people consider Dr. Seuss to be just a playful and silly children's author, he did not write simply for children. Nel referred to Seuss' post-war books, such as "Horton Hears a Who," to highlight Seuss' attacks on racism, isolationism, war and the atomic bomb.

"Green Eggs and Ham" taught me to read when I was three years old," Nel said during the question-and-answer period.

It was Dr. Seuss who showed him that reading was fun, Nel said, and pointed him in the direction of children's literature and books in general.

Nel said even in graduate school he was not aware of the effect Dr. Seuss had on his development and career.

"I blame Seuss," he said. Nel said his next book will be called "Tales for Little Rebels: A Collection of Radical Children's Literature," which he is coediting with a professor at the University of Texas.

FOOTBALL | K-STATE 61, MISSOURI STATE 10

TURNING POINT

Jordy Nelson's 24-yard touchdown pass to Deon Murphy with 11:55 remaining in the first quarter. One touchdown was all K-State needed to take control of this game. Nelson's second touchdown pass of the season capped K-State's five-play, 53-yard opening drive.

QUOTE OF THE GAME

Jordy Nelson | On teammate Deon Murphy's decision to field a punt inside the 5-yard line. "You can tell some things from the crowd noise, and that was one time I knew nothing good was happening. I turned around, and he was dancing on the goal line."

MAGIC NUMBER

27 | No. 27 had a truly magical evening, setting single-game school records for receptions (15) and receiving yards (209). Nelson's first catch gave him 100 for his career, and his final catch tied him with Jermaine Moreira for seventh on K-State's all-time receptions list with 114.

MVP

Jordy Nelson | Big surprise here. Nelson put together the best receiving performance in K-State history, and he did it in just more than three quarters.

Can't slow him down

Senior wide receiver Jordy Nelson tries to juke a Missouri State defender during K-State's 61-10 victory Saturday night at Snyder Family Stadium. Nelson had a career day, breaking K-State single-game records for receptions and receiving yards.

Nelson has a 'good day'

There was nothing remarkable about Saturday morning.

Jordy Nelson woke up in a hotel bed, just like he does before every football game.

He ate the same breakfast as everyone else on the team. Nothing exotic, just the usual breakfast staples.

"Our team meal consists of eggs, French toast, hash browns and milk," Nelson said. "Sometimes we'll have pancakes instead of French toast."

The milk was 2-percent, in case you were wondering.

There was nothing remarkable or different about Nelson's pregame routine, nothing to hint at the historic night to come.

Well, maybe one thing.

"Maybe it was because we did the Wildcat Walk on the other side of the stadium," Nelson said, tongue planted firmly in cheek. "We'll give it to that one."

A mundane day turned into an unforgettable evening for Nelson. Since Knute Rockne popularized the forward pass nearly a century ago, no Wildcat has caught more of them in a single game than Nelson did Saturday night.

The senior from Riley, Kan., did everything against Missouri State. He caught 15 passes, a school record. He tallied 209 receiving yards, also a school record. No one would have been surprised to see Nelson wearing Willie's cat-head at halftime or directing traffic in the parking lot.

"Personally, you don't go into a game thinking that you might do something like that," Nelson said. (We'll assume he meant the records, not the cat-head.) "But you just get into a flow."

You got the feeling Nelson could have caught 25 passes if the circumstances allowed it.

After his historic night, there was no way Nelson could avoid the spotlight. Reporters clustered around him, firing questions from all directions about his records, his receptions, his breakfast.

It was the kind of thing that used to make him uncomfortable, the kind of thing that prompted his self-imposed media ban last season. At the time, Nelson's silence was dissected and analyzed and misconstrued almost every way possible.

But to understand Nelson, you have to understand that every now and then, people from rural America will stop and wonder why everyone else feels the need to talk so much.

In rural America, you can sit on your porch for hours with nothing but the hum of the radio in the background. Meals and long car trips are filled with silence, punctuated by short bursts of conversation.

So it's not that he is unfriendly. It is just that sometimes, you are tired of talking. After weeks of questions about his ailing knee and K-State's offensive woes, Nelson was ready to be quiet for a while.

But now he's talking again, smiling, looking more comfortable in the spotlight than ever. He stayed in the interview room longer than anyone else Saturday, answering every question as best he could.

He even humored reporters and went through his game-day routine, searching for something out of the ordinary. In the end, though, there was only one thing he could say.

"Today," he said, "was a good day."

Nelson's record-breaking night highlights K-State win

By Jeffrey Rake
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Missouri State did not have much to celebrate following its 61-10 thumping at the hands of K-State on Saturday night at Snyder Family Stadium.

The Division I-AA team from the Gateway Conference did, however, have one noteworthy nugget.

The Bears did not allow Jordy Nelson a rushing touchdown.

Not bad, considering the senior wide receiver scored nearly every other possible way.

Nelson threw a touchdown pass, caught another and set a pair of school records with 15 catches and 209 yards receiving — by far the best single-game performance of his K-State career.

"We thought we had a good matchup with him, and we wanted to try to exploit it," said coach Ron Prince. "Jordy made the most of every opportunity we gave him."

The former walk-on from Riley, Kan., carved up a Bears secondary that worked almost exclusively in man-to-man coverage. Though the majority of his catches were medium gains, his longest reception came on his shortest route, a five-yard dump pass he turned into a 61-yard play.

"Coach called the plays to get him the ball," quarterback Josh Freeman said. "All you want is to just get the ball into Jordy's hands and let him make a play."

The previous record for catches in a game was 13, set by Michael Smith against Missouri in 1989. Darnell McDonald held the mark for single-game receiving yardage with 206 in the 1997 Fiesta Bowl. None of that, however, was foremost in Nelson's mind afterward.

"It's not what the team is worried about," said Nelson, who admitted the record might be something he will reflect on after his playing career is over. "You don't go into a game thinking you might do something like that."

K-State (2-1) could have chalked this one up in the win column early, scoring on its first three possessions and taking a 21-0 first-quarter lead.

Nelson's 24-yard touchdown pass to Deon Murphy on a reverse — the same play that was busted against Auburn — put K-State ahead just 3 minutes, 5 seconds into the game.

The play barely had started, as running back Leon Patton stumbled out of his stance and awkwardly pitched the ball back to Nelson, who was moving from left to right. Nelson threw a perfect strike on the run, as Murphy was left alone in the right corner of the end zone.

"We've worked on that for a while," Nelson said.

K-State took a 27-7 lead into halftime, helped along by one score each from James Johnson and running back Patton, as well as a pair of field goals from Brooks Rossman.

Johnson (16 carries, 114 yards) scored two of his three rushing touchdowns in the opening eight minutes of the second half, putting K-State ahead 41-7 and prompting Prince to put in many of the reserves.

The game's final two scores came on Murphy's 80-yard punt return for a touchdown, and a 3-yard TD plunge by reserve Terry

Ron Prince described the state of college offenses like a basketball game: find the match-ups and the open space.

It seems Prince and his offense put that philosophy into practice in Saturday's 61-10 win over Missouri State.

Offensive coordinator James Franklin created one-on-one match-ups for receivers Jordy Nelson and Deon Murphy, and the Wildcat receivers won almost every time.

When K-State ran the ball, James Johnson found enough open field to pile up 114 yards on 16 carries. He also found the end zone three times, the first time a Wildcat rusher scored three TDs in a game since former quarterback Allen Webb had four in 2004 against Nebraska.

With those two elements combined, the Wildcat offense had the most successful night of the Prince era with 546 total yards and 61 points.

K-State got a balanced attack, running through the Bears' defense for 221 yards and five touchdowns. In the air, the Wildcats had three passers that combined for a total of 325 yards and 2 touchdowns.

Those touchdowns included a 24-yard reverse pass from Nelson to Murphy on K-State's first offensive drive. When asked about the play, Murphy smiled and said he was wide open.

High-school friends form band, take 3rd at OPUS competition

By Brandon McAtee

With long-time friends who graduated from high school together, McCoy started as three roommates getting together and doing what they love — playing music.

McCoy, an indie and folk rock band influenced by Ryan Adams, Wilco and Death Cab for Cutie, is made up of vocalist/guitarist Jeremy Chugg, senior in pre-professional secondary education; drummer Dave Dalbey, senior in construction science and management; guitarist Josh Orwig, K-State alumnus; and bassist Nick Welch, Manhattan Christian College student.

The band formed about six months ago. Dalbey said he and Chugg had written several songs together in his basement, and when the band developed a sound around Chugg's solo work, they decided to continue playing together.

Welch said he was going to attend school in Oklahoma, but after transferring to MCC, he joined McCoy.

After playing their first show, Welch said the members received positive feedback and decided to continue playing.

"We are pretty accessible," Welch said. "Our biggest thing is we like music and try to turn that into something people will like."

McCoy performed at the Union Program Council's 21st-annual OPUS Band Competition Friday night in Bosco Student Plaza. The band took third place in the competition, which featured seven bands during a three-hour period.

"We were also looking for shows, and it's a good event," Chugg said of OPUS. "We thought it would be fun and good exposure to meet some new people."

Dalbey said band members put more thought into OPUS than other shows.

OPUS Band Competition history
OPUS replaced the Battle of the Bands contest in 1987. "Bloom County," a popular American comic strip that ran from 1980-89, featured a character named Opus. Union Program Council selected Opus as the band competition mascot because of his musical definition. UPC members obtained permission from the Washington Post before the copyrighted Opus character was used.

"We had to be in the time restraints," Welch said. "We also had to choose songs we got good feedback on and felt comfortable playing."

Chugg said the members of the band did not look at OPUS as a competition.

competitive music, so we viewed it as a good show with some diverse musicians," he said.

McCoy's members said they hope to perform for a while and tour next summer. The band also will perform during Aggiefest Sept. 21-22 in Aggieville.

"What's really fun for us is that we are all really close friends who love to play music, so the more we are able to do that is good," Chugg said.

K-State graduate creates auction Web site for Kansas residents

By Sarah Burford
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Kansans have an exclusive auction site all to themselves.

Like eBay.com, Wheat State Auction users can buy and sell items, but they can avoid paying high shipping and user fees.

Jason Burgess, creator of the site, graduated from K-State in 2006 with a degree in mechanical engineering and a determination to do something that had never been done before. In July 2007, after mulling over his idea for seven years, he began an auction Web site similar to eBay but limited to the state of Kansas, wheatstateauctions.com.

"I called it Wheat State Auction because I wanted it to be just for Kansas," he said.

Burgess said he designed his Web site to help online shoppers find items close to home, to avoid shipping costs and to allow sellers to create postings without paying a bundle in user fees.

All registered sellers on the site live in Kansas, making it easy for buyers to get their items, he said.

"It's exactly like eBay, more or less," Burgess said. "It's just around here."

Edward Lotak, Manhattan resident, discovered the Web site through a neighbor and has used it to sell several items, including a Dodge pickup.

"It gives you the opportunity to earn money from items you no longer need," Lotak said. "It's a way to recycle—keeps the landfills from filling up."

The Wheat State Auction site sells everything from new houses to children's microscopes and provides users with a menu of categories to find items easily.

Burgess said he thinks the site will especially help students who want to buy or sell used textbooks. Students could do business in their own neighborhoods and save on shipping, time and money.

Kyle Gach, senior in mechanical engineering, said he would feel more confident buying something near his home, because he could look at an item like a car before buying it. And the shipping cost is considerably less, if anything at all.

"I think the site is cool because the shipping won't be as expensive and far-fetched," Gach said.

Sellers can post as many pictures as they want on the site, as opposed to eBay, which charges 15 cents for each additional picture, according to the eBay Web site.

The fees to post items on Burgess's site are minimal. Burgess said he just began charging registered sellers on his site, but he said the fees are a fraction of what other auction sites charge and might be subject to change.

"It's a small business I'm trying to get started," Burgess said. "Ideally, I'm trying to make money."

Though it is a business, Burgess said he wants to be fair to his customers. He said he does not charge buyers commission, which refers to when auction sites charge buyers for a percentage of what they paid for an item.

"I just wanted to give people another option for getting rid of their stuff," Burgess said.

The site's features allow users to create Webstores linked to the Wheat State Auction site, post wanted items in Burgess's site and utilize Reliabid, he said.

Reliabid is a separate company that offers users "risk-free bidding," financially backing sellers who might never receive payment for an item or buyers who might never receive their item after paying for it.

Wheat State Auction allows sellers to set reserve prices, which do not allow buyers to bid under a certain price for a particular item. Sellers also can set "Buy Now" prices for their items, which allow buyers to bid at a set price and automatically win the item. Buyers may pay online with credit cards, PayPal or in cash if they choose to personally pick up the item. If shipping is necessary, the Web site offers a shipping calculator.

Burgess eventually wants to help sponsor community events and have giveaways as his company grows. He said, in the future, he would like to own a warehouse where sellers can drop off items, and Burgess will post the items online for them.

"People don't want to mess with stuff," he said. "They just want to say, 'Here's all this junk. Take it.'"

Burgess's site has gained 118 registered users since it became available in July, and Burgess said there have been more than 200 auctions thus far. He said about 500 to 1,500 different people visit the site each day.

"I think it's going to be a big benefit for a lot of people," he said. "I'm excited to see where it's going to be a year from now. The more people use it, the better it will be for everybody."

KANSAS STATE FAIR

Bag of tricks

Dogs' performance wows crowd, highlights events at Kansas State Fair in Hutchinson

By Eric Davis
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Loud techno music played as the stars of "Jump-The Ultimate Dog Show," demonstrated their athletic skills catching discs, doing back flips and wowing the crowd at the Kansas State Fair.

The 30-minute show has entertained presidents and appeared on late night talk shows. It is known internationally as one of the best dog trick shows.

To get the event started, the trainer, Lou Mack, made a brief statement about the importance of spaying and neutering pets. After his speech was over, Mack called the first dog out and got the show rolling with a trick.

The first dog, Taz, caught a few flying discs to warm up. Showcasing Taz's ability, Mack spun a disc on his finger, dropped it onto his foot and kicked it into the air. In dramatic fashion, Taz let the disc fall very close to the ground before catching it. Taz's signature trick was back flips, but he had trouble performing when commanded.

The dog's skill was not limited to running and catching a disc; Taz even caught a disc in his mouth mid flip. To end the set, Taz got a running start, jumped onto Mack's chest, and launched 10 feet into the air.

The crowd was into the show and clapped loudly after each trick.

"The part where the dog jumped high in the air, that was cool," said Colt Brown, a 7-year-old Hutchinson, Kan., resident.

Children were the loudest supporters and tried to pet each of the dogs when they were close enough.

The show also featured Buddy, one of the top-five-disc catching dogs in the nation. The highlight of Buddy's set was jumping rope with Mack. Afterward, Buddy caught a few discs like the dogs before him had done.

After jumping rope, Mack put Buddy back in his kennel and got ready for the most anticipated part of the show—the dock-jumping competition.

To start the dock jump, Mack split the crowd into two teams and introduced the teams to their respective dogs. The two dogs had more than a little trouble keeping still as the introductions were made.

Mack threw a disc over the water, and the dogs ran down the dock, jumped into the air and tried to catch the disc. The first dog needed several tries to catch his disc, but the second dog got right into the act, catching a disc on his first attempt.

At the end of the competition, both dogs jumped the same distance, 21-1/2 feet. The crowd was not disappointed by the split decision and cheered all the dogs loudly.

Trick dogs were not the only animals receiving attention at the fair. A small petting zoo was open, free of charge, for children of all ages.

The most-crowded area of the tent was the goats' exhibit. Visitors enjoyed the close interaction with the animals and tried not to give the goats more than food.

The zoo had a variety of animals including a kangaroo, a small giraffe and a zebra.

The state fair ended Sunday night, capping off 10 days full of racing pigs, jumping dogs and hungry goats.

AROUND THE FAIR

No fair would be complete without a midway. People of all ages took a break Wednesday to participate in Ride-a-Rama day, the one day of the fair when visitors pay a flat rate to ride any ride as often as they want.

The day has become such a large draw at the fair, the Hutchinson, Kan., school district now schedules teacher in-service days to combat the drop in class attendance the day creates.

Games and the food also attracted a large number of visitors. The fair offered the usual foods, like funnel cakes, large ears of corn, sweet potato fries and deep-fried candy bars.

Martha Thrash, 13, puts on her makeup as she prepares to perform as a member of the AIM Evangelist Mime Team at the Kansas State Fair on Friday afternoon. The fair provides a variety of performances from small groups to professional musical groups and performers.

Pig races were held several times a day, and many times, there was standing room only because the races were so popular. The pigs raced around a small pen, trying to win a cookie instead of a trophy. Each session of races was divided into three heats with different themes. The theme of the first race, "muscles," featured pigs named after real people. The first race winner was the red pig, named "Sylvester Staloin."

Group receives standing ovation

Legs whipped from beneath scarlet skirts to wrap around black silhouettes as Tango Buenos Aires, a dance company from Argentina, performed at McCain Auditorium Sunday night.

Many languages flooded the foyer as people migrated into the auditorium and waited for the cultural performance to begin.

The performance opened with a street scene in which a man, dressed in all black, stood alone under a blue lamp with his fedora pulled low over his eyes. When his male friends joined him, they broke out in moves so smooth, they seemed effortless, touched with an air that was strong and commanding, yet gentle.

The women sauntered out shortly after with heads held high, wearing skirts slit to the hip, to find their male partners. The dancers held each other tightly as they flipped and dipped, flicking their legs in and out and around their partners.

The word "tango" most likely derives from the word

Lyndsey Born | COLLEGIAN

Members of Tango Buenos Aires perform their original presentation, "The Four Seasons," at McCain Auditorium on Sunday evening as part of the McCain Performance Series.

"tambor," meaning drum, according to the show's program. The tango typically is accompanied by the piano, violin, guitar, flute and now the bandoneon, an accordion which has become popular in recent years.

Sarah Dotson, second-year student in veterinary medicine, said she just began taking tango lessons and likes its sensuality most of all. She said the Tango Buenos Aires performance inspired her.

"I think they do a very good job of being in the moment and not making it look scripted," Dotson said.

The finale received a standing ovation, which seemed to almost surprise the performers, who bowed a couple times and then backed off the stage while nodding to the audience.

rapist is generally described as a white male in his late 20s to early 30s. He is 5'9" to 6'0", 180 pounds with a medium build and broad shoulders. She said more recent descriptions suggest he is between 200-220 pounds with blue eyes.

"His description has changed little over the years, but it can be difficult to recognize the rapist because he wears a mask," she said.

Last month, a sketch was posted on a Facebook.com group, claiming the man in the sketch was the serial rapist. Students in the group accused a man of looking like the sketch and released his personal information.

The sketch, released by the RCPD, was of a man the police wanted to question. According to an Aug. 27 Collegian article, RCPD detective Carla Swarz said the man in the sketch is not a suspected rapist.

Swarz and Kendrick said people should not be hesitant to tell the police they know a person who matches the description of a person of interest or a suspect, though.

"None of us want to believe that someone we know could be the rapist, but that is part of why it has been difficult to catch him," she said. "Violent serial offenders often easily blend into the community."

The serial rapes account for a very small portion of rapes in Manhattan. This number does not include unreported rapes. Mary Todd, director of the K-State Women's Center, said 10-20 percent of rapes are not reported.

Many of these rapes take place close to campus in places like apartments, bars and fraternity houses. Todd said according to a report from the U.S. Department of Justice, studies have shown that a campus of K-State's size averages about 412 rapes a year.

"I really believe that number is not inflated because so many people don't report rape," she said.

Todd, who offers assistance and advice to any rape victim, said the number of people who come to talk to her as rape victims has doubled every year over the past four years.

One of the most alarming types of rape, Todd said, is the growing popularity of using date-rape drugs. She said there are even patterns of date-rape drug use in Manhattan bars.

Todd said many rapes happen to women who have been drinking.

"It's two factors," she said. "First, rapists target women who are vulnerable, and intoxication makes them vulnerable. Second, an intoxicated woman may feel she can trust everyone because all night everybody had been so nice to them."

Though Todd said most rapists cannot be identified beforehand, many show similar characteristics and actions.

One of the most recognizable rapist type is the wolf in sheep's clothing, also known as power assertive rapists. She said they are charming and clever.

"They impress people when they meet them, and they are clever, but they actually don't have loyalties to anyone," she said. "They plan ahead and what they want is to feel stronger."

Other common types of rapists are anger-retaliation rapists, who try to humiliate and punish women; opportunity rapists, who look to take advantage of rape situations, especially during other crimes; and sadistic rapists, who try to afflict serious harm to women.

Todd said women are not the only people who need to take actions against rape. Men can and should look for possible rapists.

"If you're a man of integrity, you wouldn't want to do something you would be ashamed of later in life," she said.

Todd said men possibly can see signs better than women, especially in their friends. She also said men can take more actions to stop other men.

"If a man does not respect women with friends, don't expect him to be different alone," said Todd.

VOLLEYBALL

Wildcat squad sweeps 5th-straight opponent

By Jonathan Potter
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State volleyball team swept its fifth-straight opponent Saturday at Ahearn Field House, defeating the Baylor Bears 3-0 (30-16, 30-16, 30-20). The Wildcats (10-2, 2-0) remain undefeated in Big 12 Conference play, while Baylor (7-5, 0-2) still is searching for its first Big 12 victory.

In game one, the Wildcats grabbed an early 10-4 lead, which was followed by several successful attacks from the middle. Junior middle blocker Megan Farr tallied five kills on five attacks during the game in addition to one block.

The remainder of the match showcased K-State's service game, as the Wildcats tallied six aces in game two. Three of the aces came from junior outside hitter Nataly Korobkova, who nailed three in a row to put the Wildcats up 15-7. Following Korobkova's aces, sophomore middle blocker Kelsey Chipman recorded a kill to put K-State up 16-7.

Coach Suzie Fritz said she was very pleased with her team's serving during the match, noting Korobkova's performance.

"That is the first time Nataly has been able to go back there and put together four or five in a row," Fritz said. "That was a nice little service run."

K-State did not slow down in game three, building an early 14-9 lead. After two quick Baylor points, the Wildcats rattled off a 6-0, capped by three-straight aces from senior setter Stacey Spiegelberg.

Spiegelberg, who led the Wildcats with six aces, said consistency was the key to K-State's victory.

"We just wanted to come out strong and consistent, and I think we have so far," Spiegelberg said. "It feels great to win."

Fritz said she is not surprised by the Wildcats' success and was happy to get the win.

"I see this team everyday. I know what they are capable of doing," Fritz said. "It's not surprising to me to play well."

The Wildcats' next action will be Wednesday night at Ahearn Field House as K-State plays host to Oklahoma. Play is scheduled to begin at 7 p.m.

ticket and again to gain entry to the lecture.

The general public also can pick up tickets Thursday at Bramlage and any remaining tickets will be available to the public from 10 a.m. to 4:30 p.m. Friday at Bramlage. Some tickets also will be available to K-State-Salina students and Fort Riley troops.

Though Karzai does not have the immediate name recognition like President Bush or former President Clinton, Reagan said he hopes just as many students attend this lecture.

"There's a hundred universities that would love to have him speak at their university," Reagan said. "We're kind of used to it here, but I hope K-State students take the opportunity to see a key political figure like (Karzai)."

Petrie with 1:55 left. The 61 points were the most scored by a K-State team since a 64-0 win against Kansas in 2002.

Now the Wildcats must get ready for their Big 12 Conference opener at Texas on Sept. 29, taking the week off to get in some extra preparation. The added rest, Prince said, was all a part of the approach he took to scheduling.

"We had a plan on how we wanted to play the first three games," Prince said. "Some things we wanted to show; some things we wanted to conceal. We've got a real challenging situation ahead of us."

practice," Murphy said. "(Nelson) is a tremendous passer."

With the offense settling into Prince's second year, the results are becoming noticeable on the field. This season, K-State has scored 108 points in three games, and quarterback Josh Freeman has passed for 827 yards.

"I think the second year with coach Prince is really different because we know the offense extremely well," Nelson said. "Everyone is comfortable around here, and I think it is showing a little bit, and I think we have a lot of things going for us right now."

Johnson has topped the century mark in two straight games and looks comfortable behind a line that has been playing above expectations.

"Offensive line did a great job for me tonight, so I would just like to tell them thanks," Johnson said.

The lopsided score allowed the K-State offense to put some reserves on the field. Backup running backs Jeremy Reed and Terry Petrie both saw playing time, with Petrie running for 61 yards and a touchdown.

"They always practice hard, so I knew they would carry it over into the game," Johnson said.

Seven different Wildcats hauled in passes, and two players - junior Ernie Pierce and freshman Lamar Brown - made their first career receptions.

It appears the Wildcats have discovered some new offensive weapons at exactly the right time, with the conference opener at Texas two weeks away.

"Texas is a good team," Freeman said. "We have to come out prepared like we did last year."

Afghan president, Chinese ambassador lectures postponed

By Scott Girard
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The president of Afghanistan will not speak at K-State next week.

Charles Reagan, the chair of the Landon Lecture Series, said President Karzai expressed that he must attend to a situation in Afghanistan instead of speaking next Wednesday or Thursday.

Reagan said Karzai was supposed to come to K-State after speaking in front of the United Nations in New York City on Sept. 23.

Reagan said he does not know if the lecture will be rescheduled. He said Karzai did not rule out speaking during a future visit to the United States.

Reagan also said the Oct. 10 lecture from Chinese Ambassador H.E. Zhou Wenzhong was postponed until a later date. He said the ambassador did express interest in rescheduling the lecture later this semester or early next year.

Karzai

Wenzhong

Reagan said he has lined up a possible speaker sometime in November but did not disclose the name of the speaker.

"I went from having three speakers last week to having one this week," Reagan said. "And I don't even know how solid that is."

Reagan said speakers have cancelled lectures in the past. In 1990, former Israeli Ambassador Abba Eban cancelled just one day before his lecture, and in 1998, no lectures were scheduled.

Reagan said CNN reporter Wolf Blitzer and a senator were scheduled to speak but cancelled because of President Bill Clinton's impeachment.

Reagan said though two scheduled speakers have postponed their lectures, he will not try to bring in replacement speakers.

"Our attitude is if we can't get the top people, we don't have a problem with going a semester or year without a speaker," Reagan said.

Artists from across the country participated in Friday's third-annual Friends and Neighbors Pour on the south side of West Stadium. Those involved spent several weeks preparing for the pour, making sculptures and molds.

Cast-iron pour event entails extensive planning process

By Adrienne DeWeese
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Artists describe it as an unchoreographed ballet with fire.

Cast-iron pouring, a process that involves melting iron at temperatures of 2,500 degrees Fahrenheit, is an art form that sculptors at 20 universities in the country are active in, said Daniel Hunt, associate professor and area head of sculpture in the Department of Art.

K-State has about three all-day pour events each year, which are met with a subculture and potential dangers.

PREPARING AND EXECUTING

'THE DANCE': THE CONTINUOUS-POUR PROCESS

The furnace that melts iron casts is constructed from a steel shell and lined with a refractory that basically is composed of sand and clay, Hunt said.

Artists line the bottom of the furnace with a sand bed and grapefruit-sized coke pieces. Coke is coal that has had chemicals removed from it, which makes it more porous and allows it to combust at hotter temperatures, Hunt said. Removal of impurities prevents the metal flow from becoming a "gooey mess," he said.

After the coke bed and furnace fuel are hot enough, art-

Daniel Hunt, associate professor in art, discussed safety with the group because of the hot iron they were working with and the heavy pot they carried.

ists add charges – coke, iron and flux – to the furnace. When the well fills, the spout is tapped and the metal is poured into the casts, Hunt said.

Prior to an all-day iron pour, like Friday's third-annual Friends and Neighbors Pour at K-State,

Cities try to ban revealing clothing

By Sydney Eagleton
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Get ready to either pull up your pants or reach down to your knees for your wallet to pay a fine for showing your underwear.

According to an August 29 Associated Press article, nine counties in Louisiana have either passed or are debating the ban, as are cities in Arkansas, Virginia, New Jersey, Texas and Georgia, including major cities like Dallas and Atlanta.

So far, the Manhattan community has not felt the effect of these bans.

"These communities must have some reason to take that step, but I don't think it's an issue in Manhattan," said Bruce Snead, Manhattan city commissioner and former mayor.

A similar ban was proposed in Stratford, Conn., but it was rejected on the basis that it was unconstitutional and inevitably would target minorities.

City officials and city attorneys from across the United States believe the law will be able to hold up to any challenges in court.

"Rights go both ways," said Rob Webb, a councilman from Shreveport, La. "It's not just you. It's the constitutional rights of walking down the street and not seeing someone without any clothes on. It falls on the same line."

But some disagree with this.

"We are criminalizing fashion," Shreveport. Councilman Monty Walford said. "I think (the bill) was well intended, but I'm a bit disappointed that it passed."

Each city is instating its own version of the law and determining their own punishment for illegal undergarment exposure.

"We are issuing citations," Webb said. "They have to appear before a judge and will get a fine, community service or both."

Local lawyers address domestic spying, Patriot Act during Constitution Day at K-State

The Patriot Act involves a balancing of interests among U.S. citizens and efforts to fight U.S. terrorism threats, two local attorneys said during a Constitution Day discussion Monday afternoon.

"Domestic Spying: Who is Listening?" an hour-long discussion in Forum Hall as part of Constitution Day, allowed attorneys to discuss the provisions of the Patriot Act and whether it infringes upon U.S. citizens' privacy rights.

The Patriot Act, an act of Congress that President Bush signed into law on Oct. 26, 2001, has increased law-enforcement agencies' ability to search telephone and e-mail activities, among other searches. The act expanded the authority for the purpose of fighting terrorism in the U.S. and other countries.

Barry Clark, a Manhattan private-practice trial lawyer, said constitutional principles are based on human experience. Clark said the Fourth Amendment, which protects citizens from unreasonable searches and seizures, is his favorite because it forms the cornerstone of the Bill of Rights.

"The Fourth Amendment is very short, but there's lots in it," Clark said. "It's been the subject of countless legal opinions over the years."

It is often said the Fourth Amendment only protects people, not places, Clark said. This differentiation has been the subject of debates during the course of the Patriot Act, he said.

Jacqueline Butler, assistant university attorney, said citizens must remove emotion from issues surrounding the Patriot Act to determine its legality.

"A primary component of making a determination of reasonableness is a balancing of the interests involved," Butler said.

Former Kansas Gov. John Carlin moderated the discussion between Clark and Butler. As a former archivist of the U.S. for the National Archives and Records Administration, Carlin said the Constitution is not an "old relic."

"It's a document that impacts us – literally, individually – everyday," said Carlin, visiting professor in political science. "We're not aware of it, but we are impacted."

Constitution Day started after Sen. Robert Byrd, D-W. Va., who carries a copy of the Constitution in his pocket every day, added an amendment to Public Law 108-447 in 2005. The amendment mandates that all schools that receive federal funds, as well as federal agencies, teach the Constitution on the actual birthday of the Constitution.

TIPS TO HELP REDUCE CANCER

1. DRINK POMEGRANATE JUICE

The fruit's deep red juice contains polyphenols, isoflavones and ellagic acid — elements researchers believe make up a potent anticancer combo.

2. ORDER SUSHI

The seaweed in sushi has been proven to fight cancer. As an added bonus, sushi is also packed with protein.

3. RELAX A LITTLE

Purdue University tracked 1,600 men over 12 years and found that half of those with increasing levels of worry died during the study period, and 34 percent of the neurotic men died of some type of cancer.

4. GET SOME SUN

Though too much sun can be harmful, none also can be bad. Studies have shown the natural Vitamin D from the sun is healthier than taking supplements.

5. EAT BLUEBERRIES

Got pterostilbene? Rutgers University researchers say this compound — found in blueberries — has colon cancer-fighting properties.

6. BALANCE YOUR SELENIUM

Selenium can reduce your risk for cancer by as much as 92 percent if you initially had a low level of selenium. However, men with high levels will be put at a greater risk if they take selenium supplements.

7. CLEAR YOUR AIR

A recent American Journal of Public Health study reveals that nonsmokers working in smoky places had three times the amount of MNK, a carcinogen, in their urine than nonsmoking workers in smoke-free joints had.

Plans underway for bioscience-focused K-State campus in Olathe

By Brigitte Brecheisen
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Preparations have been made in anticipation of the K-State-Olathe Innovation Campus.

Tim Danneberg, spokesman for the City of Olathe, said during the last year, K-State has worked with the Kansas Bioscience Authority to begin development on a satellite campus and adjacent research park in Olathe, Kan., a suburb of Kansas City.

About a year after the City of Olathe expressed an interest in developing a bioscience research facility, a formal land donation was issued to the project, Danneberg said.

Olathe's Chamber of Commerce announced in the Aug. 15 Olathe Business Report the city officially has sold the land to K-State and the Kansas Bioscience Authority for a mere $10.

Danneberg said the 92 acres of land were donated for the campus because the benefits associated with the upcoming project would outweigh the costs.

The land has an estimated market value of $9 million and is located by the City of Olathe northeast of the College Boulevard and Lone Elm intersection.

The projected economic effect of the park includes $150 million in public and private investments and 3,000 jobs, according to a June 6 Lawrence Journal-World report.

Of the 92 acres, 38 will be allocated to the K-State Innovation Campus, and the remainder will be used by the KBA to develop a bioscience park.

Danneberg said city council members thought this project would be an incredible opportunity for Olathe and the entire region to create many jobs for the future.

During his State of the University Address on Friday, President Jon Wefald outlined the basis for the decision to build the campus.

During 2003-04, the Greater Kansas City Chamber of Commerce tried to decide what the future goals of the Kansas City area should include.

After determining that biosciences would be the future of the Kansas City Metro area, K-State began to forge important partnerships with animal-health firms in the Kansas City area, Wefald said in his address.

K-State officials also acknowledged the benefits the campus will have on the main-campus university.

"We viewed this as an opportunity to increase visibility and meet the education and research needs for prospective students in the area," said Ron Trewyn, K-State vice president for research.

The satellite campus will offer intensive graduate programs focusing on the biosciences, animal health and food safety and security.

"Initial efforts will link to K-State's expertise in food security and also into private sectors of the Kansas City Area Animal Health Corridor," Trewyn said.

Funding for the Innovation Campus is expected to come from private donations. Trewyn said there would need to be a capital campaign to raise money for the facilities on the new campus. Direct figures on the cost of the campus are unknown, Dan-neberg said.

KBA spokesman Chad Bettes said the group has outlined plans for how the land will be used.

Bettes stressed the importance of developing a 25,000-square-foot wet-lab facility for early stage bioscience companies in the future park.

"This is important because bioscience companies require highly specialized facilities that can be out of reach for many early stage firms," Bettes said.

KBA will invest $10 million in the development project, which will begin construction in 2008. The KBA acquires its funding through a tax growth on the expansion of Kansas bioscience industries.

Bettes said the KBA expects the taxes to generate $581 million during a 16-year period.

President Jon Wefald described the importance that the K-State-Olathe Innovation Campus is going to have on the future of Johnson County and K-State.

"For the first time in the history of K-State, we will now have a university campus in Johnson County where about 25,000 K-State graduates live," Wefald said during his address.

"This new KSU-Olathe Innovation Campus is extremely important for our university because it takes our animal-research capabilities directly to the metropolitan area that is so involved in animal health."

The City of Olathe also is looking forward to the future addition, Danneberg said.

"This is a once-in-a-lifetime opportunity for a community," he said.

Comedian Bob Hope entertains crowd at K-State Parents' Day in 1976

This Saturday will mark the 79th year of K-State's Family Day, though it originally was called Parents' Day.

With this weekend's events and activities, take a look back at an article from the Sept. 13, 1976, Collegian when K-State's Parents' Day had a memorable guest.

BOB HOPE BECOMES NEW WILDCAT

By Eric Pedersen
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Bob Hope, the "master of entertainment," added Manhattan to the endless list of cities in which he has performed, as the 73-year-old comedian delighted a capacity Parents' Day crowd of 12,000 Saturday night in Ahearn Field House.

Describing Manhattan as the "gateway to Wamego," Hope displayed his very special brand of topical humor. He also sang several songs and did a soft-shoe routine.

Hope poked fun at everything from politics to Manhattan's Holiday Inn. His own words best tell the evening's story.

Hope described Parents' Day as an occasion when "parents bring the checks in person."

About Congress and its rash of sex scandals, Hope said: "This may not be the best Congress we've ever had, but it's certainly the most affectionate. I don't know why anybody would want to be president when Congressmen are having all that fun. It's nice to know that the girls are doing to Congress what Congress has been doing to us all these years."

On playing golf with President Ford: "The security is very tight. One time I hit my ball near a tree, and the tree got up and moved."

On President Ford's favorite pastime, skiing: "President Ford has to ski a lot to get used to the snow job Congress is giving him."

About Jimmy Carter and peanuts: "Jimmy Carter knows a lot about peanuts, but don't ask him. Ask his two sons, Skipper and Jif."

Hope said Carter's wife didn't know her sons smoked marijuana until she "saw them floating over the barn."

On his younger days when he played football: "I used to play center, but I had to quit. I was too ticklish."

On current movies: "They're doing things on the screen that I didn't do on my honeymoon."

About the Manhattan Holiday Inn: "I've been to hotels where the walls were so thin you could hear the other people, but I've never seen them before."

Hope said a girl pounded on his motel door for three hours, and he finally "had to let her out."

Hope, who admitted to being an avid football fan, complimented the K-State football squad for its 13-3 victory over Brigham Young Saturday afternoon. He had special words of praise for K-State kicker Bill Sinovic.

"One of Sinovic's punts went so high that it had soil from Mars on it when it came down," Hope said.

Hope spoke briefly at half-time of the game.

Hope received several presentations at the end of the show. He received a carved likeness of his nose, a Manhattan Country Club golf cap and a bent golf putter from "B.C." in Los Angeles.

Hope also was given an honorable admiralship in Manhattan's Tuttle Creek Navy.

Preceding Hope were performances by the K-State Jazz Ensemble and singer Patricia Price.

"Thanks for the memories," Hope concluded.

K-State could say the same.

Saintly sinner

Nun's selflessness deserves our respect despite her doubts

She spent a whole life taking care of sick and dying people in Calcutta, India. She set up missionaries all over the globe to help fight poverty. She gave hope to millions of people. She was truly a woman of God. Or was she?

A recent book, "Mother Teresa: Come Be My Light," a compilation of her correspondence between her closest friends and superiors, reveals Mother Teresa was riddled with doubt in her Christian faith.

The following is from a letter to one of Mother Teresa's confessors: "I am told God loves me — and yet the reality of darkness and coldness and emptiness is so great that nothing touches my soul. Did I make a mistake in surrendering blindly to the Call of the Sacred Heart?"

Mother Teresa questioned her beliefs, but there are few people that have completely unwavering faith.

People throughout the Bible, including Jesus, have doubts in their faith and the existence of God, so why are some people so enraged by these recent findings about the life and thoughts of Mother Teresa?

In columns and stories, she has been called a liar and a hypocrite, among other terms. In an Aug. 23 Time magazine article, the author calls several of Mother Teresa's actions "extravagantly dissonant," while various other religious authors call these doubts just part of her religious journey.

So-called religious experts, on both sides of faith, have separate opinions on the meaning of these findings. Phyllis Zagano, a religious studies professor at Hofstra University and nationally syndicated columnist, said in a recent column the findings do not change her work or faith.

On the other end of the spectrum, atheist author Christopher Hitchens claimed Mother Teresa just saw the light and truth of God's nonexistence. Hitchens also calls Mother Teresa's doubt a result of an overbearing religion, the Roman Catholic Church.

But I do not know how much one could take of a person who calls Mother Teresa "fraudulent" and a "fanatic," and has a track record of outrageous and anti religious claims.

Some people are extremely upset, some people see it as a sign of her strong faith, and others see it as a sign of God's nonexistence. What does it matter?

Mother Teresa saved many children and cared for more people than all of the people in the United States combined. She had her doubts, but that did not stop her from her work and humanitarian aid.

The following is an excerpt from the book detailing one of her conversations with Jesus: "If this brings You glory — if souls are brought to You — with joy I accept all to the end of my life."

SCOTT GIRARD

Jess Boatwright | COLLEGIAN

Nothing stopped her from her life long fight against poverty. The book says she had extremely dark nights of misery and doubt that she compared at times to hell.

If she can overcome those numerous nights of questioning the aspects of her life and still make a difference, she is above any title or opinion writer against her.

Fortunately, the people of Calcutta take nothing from the recent revelations about Mother Teresa.

The order she founded, the Missionaries of Charity, is larger than ever with more than 750 clinics worldwide, according to The Associated Press, where people are saved from the streets every week.

One of the Indian patients at the Calcutta mission said, "We would have been dead if the sisters had not brought us here."

It is good to see a few doubts do not hinder the actions of a caring population. Maybe it is time for us to look for that kind of care, beyond any thoughts of religion, in our own lives.

TO THE POINT

Constitution deserves attention

As yesterday was Constitution Day, we on the Collegian editorial board wanted to express our respect and thankfulness for the liberties we enjoy under our democratic constitution. While many others in the world suffer injustice because of the lack of basic freedoms and rights, we in the United States are afforded a wealth of opportunity and a just government.

Unfortunately, we find that many students do not understand their inherited constitutional rights. While we understand the Constitution is a long, tedious document, it is still imperative to our everyday lives.

The strength of our Constitution is that it not only establishes a government, but a government which — in Thomas Jefferson's words — can "govern itself." Through the system of checks and balances, the Constitution organizes and maintains balance to the most powerful government in the world and is the oldest national constitution still in use in the world.

At the Collegian, we practice our First Amendment right to freedom of speech daily. Some nations still cannot have a free press independent of the government. Despite our race, sex or nationality, every U.S. citizen is guaranteed equality under the law, and for that we are thankful. Because of the many men and women who have dedicated their lives to interpreting, protecting and living our Constitution, we feel that every citizen, especially our future leaders at K-State, should at least give it a read.

Hot, steamy advertisements push away consumers

Served hot and cooked to perfection, burgers have the ability to sell themselves just by looking tasty. Focusing on the food is one of the best ways to sell a product.

According to Businesswire.com, Brad Haley, executive vice president of marketing for Carl's Jr. Restaurants, said the burger has been around for almost 60 years and "... needed an image make-over to become more relevant for today's fast-food consumers." The problem with advertisers is finding an effective way to solicit their product, but recent television commercials have taken it a step too far.

As sexual promiscuity becomes increasingly accepted in our society, advertisers follow suit by eliciting more licentious commercials than should be tolerated by self-respecting individuals.

CKE Restaurants, Inc., owners of Carl's Jr. and Hardee's, released a commercial Aug. 28 to promote the Patty Melt Burger — a cheeseburger on flat-grilled rye bread.

The "image make over" advertisers were hoping for did not entice people who think above a primal level.

The American Family Association described the commercial as featuring a sexualized female teacher doing a stripper-style dance on top of her desk, while two male students rap a song entitled "I Like Flat Buns."

This advertisement portrays female teachers in a provocative and disrespectful way as well as emphasizing that the value of a woman is based on her sexual attractiveness.

The commercial hits a soft spot for teachers nationwide. With numerous cases of teachers having sexual relationships with students in the past few years, the commercial adds fuel to the fire to discredit their profession.

Reported by the Mercury News, an Aug. 31 press release from Tennessee Education Association President Earl Winman, said "It is unbelievably demeaning to every one of them to promote a television advertisement showing a young teacher gyrating on top of her desk while boys in the class rap about her body in order to sell hamburgers."

Aside from belittling a respectable profession, the commercial further exacerbates the problem women face of not being valued for anything other than their bodies.

Dr. Richard F. Taflinger described the obvious truths of what a man finds appealing in a study entitled, "You and Me, Babe: Sex and Advertising" on May 28, 1996.

"Although our culture considers deeming mere physical appearance as all that is necessary to make a woman desirable sexist and demeaning to women, the fact remains that for a male it is all that is necessary, an inheritance of biological nature," Taflinger said.

Assuming Taflinger is correct, it makes no sense for CKE Restaurants to isolate their female market. This mistake already has hurt them financially.

According to statistics from the New York Stock Exchange after the advertisement ran, CKE Restaurants experienced a drop in sales by 1 percent among Hardee's stores, while Carl's Jr. remained flat.

The advertisement campaign did not work and showed sex does not always sell.

Advertisers need to realize the harm advertisements like these cause and find a more creative way to sell their products without relying on disrespectful and over-used innuendos.

Professor chosen as Wefald Leadership Chair settles in at K-State

By Kristin Hodges
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Stacked cardboard boxes surround the otherwise bare office of Thomas Wright in Calvin Hall. The new professor of management will fill his office and a new position created this year.

Wright was chosen to be the first Jon Wefald Leadership Chair in the College of Business.

THE LEADERSHIP CHAIR

Yar Ebadi, dean of business, said the position was created in 2005, and it merited a national search.

According to literature from the College of Business, Paul and Susan Edgerley established the Jon Wefald Leadership Chair through a $500,000 donation. Paul Edgerley is a K-State alumnus, and the position is the third the couple has helped create.

The endowed chair is through the Kansas Partnership for Faculty of Distinction Program sponsored by the Kansas Board of Regents.

At K-State, Wright will have several responsibilities, including teaching classes and directing the College of Business Center for Leadership, Ebadi said.

"As an expert in organizational behavior and leadership, the courses Dr. Wright will teach, as well as his research and other academic responsibilities, align most closely within the management discipline," he said.

Wright's East Coast accent seeped out slightly as he described his experience living on the coast and recent arrival to the Midwest.

"I can honestly say I have liked every place I have lived," he said. "I was told that (in Manhattan) you will have people waving at you and smiling. I've always heard positive things. I have been very pleasantly surprised with how most people are."

Wright said he grew up on the East Coast, but came to K-State from the University of Nevada at Reno where he was a tenured professor in management.

As the first chair, Wright said he is excited for the flexibility available.

"One of my other charges is - through my research and working with other faculties - to create synergies to help facilitate K-State's reputation with management research," he said.

He said he wants to develop outreach programs for K-State constituents and stake holders, and he plans to develop a leadership class within the leadership institute.

AREAS OF EXPERTISE

Brian Niehoff, department head and professor of management, said the search to fill the position started last fall. Though candidates were reviewed throughout the nation, he said Wright was chosen because of his teaching abilities and research contributions.

"He has an outstanding record of research in the area of leadership," Niehoff said, "and I think that he is really going to make some great contributions to the classroom."

Niehoff said he thinks Wright will benefit K-State for many reasons, including the connections Wright has made around the world.

Wright's international reputation is because of his research that is recognized in management journals, Niehoff said.

Wright said he is the associate editor for the Journal of Management and the Journal of Organizational Behavior.

"It does take a lot of time," he said. "One has to wear multiple hats, and I can always work on being a better multi tasker."

Wright also has been named a fellow of the Association for Psychological Science. According to the association's Web site, the organization awards the fellow status to its members who "have made sustained outstanding contributions to the science of psychology in the areas of research, teaching, service and application."

OTHER INTERESTS

Wright's expertise also reaches outside the areas of academics as a self-described gym fanatic.

He said he is a member of the World Association of Benchers and Deadlifters and competes in Master's Powerlifting meets, which are for members 40 years and older.

"I try to train five or six days a week," he said. "Although as I get older, I do a lot more stretching than I did when I was younger."

Wright said he joined the organization in 2004 and began competing after his younger gym friends told him he was "strong ... for an old guy."

He said he wanted to know what that meant, and now he has competed in world championships and is the reigning world champion of the bench press for his age and weight category.

"I was pretty proud about that," he said. "I'm very competitive - so I don't remember the losses so to speak, but I had a lot of fun doing that, and my wife is supportive because it keeps me out of trouble."

THE BEGINNING

This semester, Wright teaches Behavioral Management Theory and he said the course material is similar to the courses he taught in Nevada.

"From the few weeks I have been teaching, I am very much enjoying the class here and the students - I haven't put them to sleep yet," he laughed.

Wright said the course teaches students the benefits of understanding the behavior involved with companies and their employees. He said the research involved in the studies helps both the company's productivity and the employees' psychological well being.

"My research is always focused not only on the organization but on the individuals in the organization," he said.

Wright said his first impressions of the campus have been positive, and everyone has been very welcoming.

"My wife is already working on her various purple outfits," he said, "and she got me a nice K-State tie. Both my wife and I are very much looking forward to being a part of the KSU and Manhattan community."

Prince's calls keep opponents on toes

The only way to keep a play concealed, the only way to prevent it from appearing in another coach's film room, is to simply not run it in a game.

JEFFREY
RAKE

Once a play is used in a game situation, it's out of the bag forever. Every coach in America not only has access to it, but they'll study it, analyze it, and most importantly, figure out a way to stop it.

Following K-State's 61-10 drubbing of Missouri State on Saturday, coach Ron Prince alluded to the fact that his play calling so far this season has been, if nothing else, calculated.

"We had a plan on how we wanted to play the first three games," Prince said. "Some things we wanted to show; some things we wanted to conceal."

In my opinion, Prince had no interest in concealing anything – and he didn't.

K-State shouldn't have needed a trick play to score its first touchdown against Missouri State. By the looks of it, the Wildcats might not have needed 11 players, either.

That's why initially, it made no sense to see Prince unveiling plays that could have better served his team in Big 12 Conference play. Missouri State didn't strike me as a team loaded with talent. The Bears probably weren't worth anything more than a straight-ahead dive or a toss play.

Generally speaking, coaches playing an inferior team will try to stay as vanilla as they possibly can offensively to avoid exposing their playbooks.

Why give a future opponent usable game tape when you don't have to?

Prince, one might think, had a reason. Maybe he wanted to send a message to Texas, reminding them that he's willing to use the unconventional plays that have worked a number of times before.

After all, those same trick plays contributed to K-State's big win a year ago, when the Wildcats put up 45 points against a veteran Texas defense.

No team likes to get beat the same way twice.

The brilliance of the trick plays K-State has employed this season is that they are run out of precisely the same formation.

Against Auburn, Nelson's touchdown toss came off a screen pass from quarterback Josh Freeman.

Against Missouri State, though, Nelson threw his TD pass after taking a handoff. Pre-snap, both plays were eerily similar.

The way in which they were executed was decidedly different.

The fearlessness Prince has shown with the play calling and his insistence on changing things up – even against a team like Missouri State – makes the Wildcats a difficult team to prepare for.

K-State's offensive line, a huge concern coming into the season, seems to have settled in.

As a result, the Wildcats have flexibility and a certain freedom to call any play at any time. They can mix things up a bit. They're dangerous.

Sure, opposing teams might know what's coming. Remember, it's all right there on the game tape. The challenge is determining when it's coming.

Oh, yeah, and how to stop it.

Prince sees promise in backups after Missouri State game

By Wendy Haun
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Redshirt freshman quarterback Carson Coffman got his first glimpse of the K-State gridiron in Saturday's 61-10 win over Missouri State. He completed two passes on two attempts for 14 yards. He also had one rushing attempt, but was dropped three yards behind the line of scrimmage.

At Monday's media conference, coach Ron Prince said he felt comfortable putting Coffman on the field.

"You can see when he's been on the field, he's made two pretty accurate throws," Prince said. "I'm real pleased with his mechanics right now and his fundamentals. Just watching him in pregame and how the ball rolls off his hand real well, I didn't have any hesitancy in playing him at the end of the game since he's been here."

Coffman, who graduated from Raymore-Peculiar (Mo.) High, quarterbacked the white team in K-State's spring game.

Junior place-kicker Brooks Rossman hit a pair of field goals Saturday during K-State's 61-10 win over Missouri State.

His football legacy includes his father, Paul, who played for K-State from 1975 to 1977 and then went on to the NFL; and his older brother, Chase, who is a tight-end at Missouri.

"He's been pretty excited about getting into the game," Prince said. "Taking the snaps and getting some runs under his belt, handing the ball off – I think that's the right way to break a young quarterback in, to get used to being out there on the stage and articulating the cadence and handling the motions. For all of the fans who were able to see him at spring game, I think he's improved since then."

KICKING GETS ON TRACK

One of the woes plaguing K-State this season had been the kick-return game. But on Saturday, junior wide receiver Deon Murphy was able to break loose for an 80-yard punt return, and junior placekicker Brooks Rossman connected on a pair of field goals.

"We're really pleased with our kicking game," Prince said. "We're pleased with our placement kicker, and we're real pleased with our returners."

However, Prince said he sees a few things that need to be fixed. K-State's kickoff return team, No. 1 in the nation last year, has slipped this season.

Middle management

2 blockers lead team in hitting percentage

By Jonathan Potter
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Coach Suzie Fritz was the first to applaud middle blockers Megan Farr and Kelsey Chipman, and she continues today.

"They have been good from start to finish," Fritz said. "I keep saying it, and nobody believes me, but they are our most consistent attackers and have been from the very beginning of the season."

Farr and Chipman already are proving their worth this season, leading the team in hitting percentage and blocks. The duo has amassed 210 of the Wildcats' 665 kills. Farr has tallied 101 kills on .388 hitting, while Chipman has recorded 109 on .328 hitting.

Fritz said Farr and Chipman have been a main factor in K-State's victories and will continue their success throughout the season.

In four of the Wildcats' last five matches, Farr has finished over .500 in hitting. Her recent success has elevated her season hitting percentage, as she leads the team with 209 attacks. The last time Farr did not finish over .500 was against Kansas, when she recorded 13 kills on .480 hitting.

Farr said she can't take all the credit for her recent success, crediting senior setter Stacey Spiegelberg for triggering K-State's offense.

"We are just passing really well," Farr said. "Stacey is setting us awesome too. (Her) setting is helping a lot."

Spiegelberg is the Wildcats' primary setter and leads the team in assists with 541. She said she does not favor setting the middle blockers but has been pleased with their offensive performance.

"They have been a strong point in our offense for a while now," Spiegelberg said of the middle blockers. "When we are passing well, I can go to them. They are hitting really well, so it's good to establish them early in the game."

Fritz said she is happy with the way the Wildcats' middle blockers are creating openings in the opposing defense, allowing outside hitters Nataly Korobkova and

TO THE EDITOR

Politics must involve moral values; law cannot depend on conscience

Editor,

It is not usually my custom to comment on student editorials, but when the stunning idiocy (and I use that word in both its classical and modern senses) of Megan Molitor's "Moral values should have no place in political decisions" evinced the reaction of C.S. Lewis' fictional Professor Kirk – "What do they teach them in these schools?" – the realization that in the final instance, "these schools" is this university that prompts me to write.

Is it really the case that one can acquire three-fourths of a K-State education (and majoring in journalism, a field not distant from politics) without understanding that all political decisions are fundamentally moral decisions? The leftist's notion that the state ought succor the poor out of tax revenues, and the rightist's judgment that, to the contrary, income redistribution is a form of theft are both moral judgments.

All of criminal law is an instantiation of one moral notion or another – "Thou shalt not steal," for instance being embodied in laws against burglary, robbery, fraud, embezzlement, vandalism, insider trading and the like. Deciding whether or not to go to war is likewise a moral judgment: is some evil so intolerable that the evils inherent in war are to be preferred?

Checking one's moral judgment at the voting booth door leads to the bizarre situation in which voters decide among candidates without regard for the direction they will take the country. (One wonders on what basis: competence? length of résumé?)

Would Molitor have the absolute pacifist ignore personal moral beliefs to vote for an advocate of strong defense and international interventionism? It seems unlikely. No more will a voter who firmly believes that children who have not had the good fortune to be born are indeed human beings – entitled to the same rights and protections before the law as the rest of us – ignore that belief to vote for a candidate who supports untrammelled access to abortion or the dismemberment of human embryos for medical research.

We really must hope Molitor has delayed fulfilling some distribution requirements for his senior year and still will manage in a philosophy or political science course to acquire a clearer understanding of the relationship between the basic question of morality – how ought we live? – and the basic question of politics – how ought our society organize itself? – before K-State confers a degree on her, thereby certifying her as educated.

David Yetter
PROFESSOR OF MATHEMATICS AND FACULTY ADVISER

Editor,

I doubt Megan Molitor truly believes what she wrote in her Sept. 13 column. (Very few people could.) The first of two dangerous ideas expressed is that "political decisions need to be based upon what is best for the country and what is constitutionally acceptable."

The Constitution contains a number of moral judgments: for example, the idea that it is wrong to discriminate upon the basis of race, gender or creed. Apparently, we could do without that misguided moral legislation and instead focus on "what's best for the country."

There is apparently no problem in Molitor's eyes with starting expansionary foreign wars, enslaving minorities, polluting the environment, or packing up anyone who disagrees and shipping them to Guantanamo Bay, as long as the benefits to Uncle Sam outweighed the cost.

Secondly, she writes that this "country is capable of deciding for themselves." Deciding what? Molitor seems to imply that every individual should be able to decide for themselves what's right and what's wrong.

Is she seriously suggesting we should depend on the everyman's conscience to guide his actions instead of the law? Could anybody find a serial killer's actions acceptable just because it didn't bother their conscience to kill? Since that person's choice of whether or not to murder is a moral one (see the Bible), should the U.S. government simply leave him to his "choice?" The thought is nonsensical. People should think through their ideas before they go spreading them.

Readers address facts, fairness in illegal immigration column

Editor,

To educate the Kansas State Collegian's readers, the Hispanic American Leadership Organization would like to respond to Brigitte Brecheisen's fears of tuberculosis outbreaks among Mexican immigrants.

The Kansas State Collegian's editorial staff published the following disclaimer on Sept. 13: "While we can't promise all our readers will agree with the Collegian's opinion columns, we do try to make sure they are factually correct." We would therefore like to address our concerns with Brecheisen's piece by offering the following clarifications of the facts and of the rhetorical moves used to convince readers that an opinion based on racist paranoia was justified.

Firstly, Brecheisen's conflation of immigrants, illegal immigrants and Mexicans is misleading. There are many illegal immigrants from around the world, not just Mexicans. People crossing the Mexican border might not all be Mexican nor are all Hispanics necessarily of Mexican descent. Even if the source information is biased against the Mexican community, responsible journalists bother to seek balanced and truthful information.

Secondly, the medical facts in this column were misleading. Tuberculosis is not a viral infection but a bacterial infection caused by Mycobacterium Tuberculosis. While it is true that TB is highly contagious, not everyone testing positive for the bacterial infection has TB. The National Library of Medicine and The National Institutes of Health both confirm that in most countries around the world, including Mexico, children are vaccinated at birth with the BCG vaccine to prevent TB, which results in a large number of false-positive tests.

These false-positive tests explain the 131 incidents that occurred at the South Carolina Poultry Plant. In the end, only two were identified as potential active cases. Both cases are asymptomatic and show no sign of the active disease, most likely indicating the disease is inactive. If indeed a person has the inactive form of the disease, TB cannot be spread to others.

According to the World Health Organization, of all cases of latent TB, only 5 to 10 percent develop active tuberculosis.

Finally, we question the placement of this opinion on the anniversary of the attacks on the World Trade Center. According to the Center for Immigration Studies, public attitudes about immigration in the U.S. have been heavily influenced by the aftermath of the Sept. 11 attacks.

We are concerned about the implications of Brecheisen's opinion column and the offensive caricature accompanying the piece. What are the true intentions of such publications? Are they meant to inform our community about TB? Or is the goal to spread more anti-immigrant sentiment? The information we submitted above unfortunately suggests the latter.

Jorge Mendoza
JUNIOR IN BIOLOGY

Editor,

I am writing in response to the article published in the Sept. 11 issue by Brigitte Brecheisen. Instead of an article commemorating the lives lost six years ago, I was disappointed to find an article contradicting the very diversity K-State stands for and infused with generalized statements intended to mislead the reader.

The first thing Ms. Brecheisen should know is tuberculosis is not a problem associated specifically with immigrants. Where was she this summer when Andrew Speaker, a white Atlanta attorney, traveled across Europe and back on a commercial plane after health officials ordered him not to?

Despite what Brecheisen implies, TB rates in the United States have actually hit an all-time low with only 13,767 cases last year. The so-called outbreak the writer speaks of involved immigrants – not necessarily illegal or Mexicans (despite her implications, not all immigrants, legal or illegal, are Mexican).

The real outbreak is having people like Brecheisen contaminate our society with her racist, poisonous views. If she thinks it is merely a fabrication that these people do in fact help our country, perhaps she should take her misinformed, Nazi-like views and work the jobs these "miscreants" do for us at close to nothing in salary.

New Swahili class might spark African Studies program at K-State

By April Newby
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Students are experimenting with a recently added language this semester.

Swahili I is offered in the modern languages department, though the numbers of students enrolled in the class are low.

Robert Corum, department head of modern languages, said the new Swahili class has only five students enrolled this semester. However, he said, this is just the beginning.

"Other language classes such as Arabic and Chinese began with similar enrollments," Corum said. "I'm confident that enrollment will increase."

Edward Nafziger, graduate student in food safety and Swahili professor, said he thought enrollment for the class will increase in the future.

"I have seen an overwhelming interest in the language," Nafziger said. "I get emails at least every week about it."

Nafziger said he structured the class similar to other language courses offered at K-State. He targets components like pronunciation, simple sentences and greetings.

"My ultimate goal for the students is for them to be able to express themselves fluently in the language," he said.

The course is the first African language class offered at K-State and is part of the new African Studies Center established at the university.

Emizet Kisangani, associate professor of political science and director of the African Studies Center, said the university created the center after receiving a Targeted Excellence Grant for $253,725 to establish a greater African cultural awareness at the university.

He said the center's purpose was two fold.

"With this grant, we hope to both increase K-State visibility by doing research with African universities and establish a minor in African studies for undergraduates," Kisangani said.

Kisangani said more than 20 professors are doing African-related research at K-State — nearly twice as many as other universities like the University of Kansas, which already has an African Studies program and several African language classes.

"We have more Africanists at K-State than other nearby universities," Kisangani said, "but not nearly as many African courses of study."

The Swahili course is helping K-State close the gap with other universities.

"We are far, far behind other universities offering African Studies," Kisangani said. "We need to catch up if we can."

Corum said Swahili II is set to be available in spring 2008. He said he hoped to expand the program to Swahili VI and eventually to a minor in the language.

"The abbreviation is 'WTF,' which nobody seemed to find funny but me. The festival is one of the best in the country. I went to learn and to take classes from renowned teachers and actors."

—MICHAEL WEISER, SENIOR IN THEATRE, ON HIS SUMMER APPRENTICESHIP AT THE WILLIAMSTOWN THEATRE FESTIVAL

Acting out

Student an apprentice at East Coast acting festival

By Megan Molitor
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

They called him "Kansas," but it didn't bother him a bit.

"Everyone would blame things I didn't know on the fact that I was from Kansas, like if I didn't know the latest Broadway play," said Michael Wieser, senior in theatre. "It was all in fun, though."

Surrounded by prestigious actors and actresses it would be easy for anyone to feel nervous. But for Wieser, it was something he had always dreamed of.

Last summer, Wieser lived out his dream as an apprentice at the Williamstown Theatre Festival, in Williamstown, Mass. The Festival, a Tony-award-winning event, was June 13-Aug. 19.

"The abbreviation is 'WTF,' which nobody seemed to find funny but me," Wieser said. "The festival is one of the best in the country. I went to learn and to take classes from renowned teachers and actors."

During the day, Wieser took classes from acting stars who were at the festival to perform, and at night, he was performing, rehearsing or taking down sets. As one of 70 apprentices, Wieser said he decided to participate mainly for the prestige of the festival.

"I was surrounded by Juilliard and Yale students," he said. "I know that most people try for three or four years to get in, and I got in on my first try. I have been very blessed."

Wieser said he knew about the festival through its fame and had read about it in books for class.

There was no actual audition; he simply sent in his headshot, résumé, letter of intent and three letters of recommendation. He said around 400 students applied.

"I applied in March and found out that I had gotten the apprenticeship in April," he said.

"One of the directors of the festival called me and offered it to me."

"He asked if I wanted it and if I wanted time to think about it, and I instantly accepted. I tried to be very calm, and I thanked him repeatedly. I think I might have jumped."

Wieser said one of his greatest accomplishments while in Williamstown was playing his bagpipe in one of the Festival's biggest shows, "Corn is Green."

"I'm a K-State bagpiper, and I was playing on the back lawn," he said.

"My boss came out and said that I sounded good and I should play in the show. I said I would, and I got to play."

Wieser also played in a late-night cabaret, which he said served as a good conversation starter with members of the American Equity Actors association, which is the union for stage actors. He said he was also pleased with how much he was able to work.

"I got to participate in four small projects," Wieser said. "I was able to be seen, and I'm very proud of my work. The biggest challenge was getting over being star struck."

"After all, I'm just a guy from Kansas."

Included in the line-up of stars at the festival were Academy Award-nominated actress Kathleen Turner and Roger Rees of "Robin Hood: Men in Tights."

Wieser said he became interested in theater after seeing a performance at his high school when he was in third grade.

He then auditioned for his first play, "The Lion, the Witch, and the Wardrobe," in the fourth grade. Wieser played Mr. Tumnus.

He has been in six productions at K-State and will perform in "Fiddler on the Roof" in November. When he graduates, Wieser said he plans to work for a year, acting in Kansas City, and will then move to New York City.

"I love the process of acting. You get to live life through another's eyes," Wieser said. "I get to solidify who I am, and it helps me find what part of me is in my character, and I can connect with anyone. It is both a challenge and a blessing."

Wieser said his advice for fellow actors is to remember their heritage.

"All you kids from Kansas, embrace it," he said. "People will attribute to you a Midwestern 'good ol' guy or gal' side. Kansas people are happy people. Just be yourself, because then they will know how to cast you for a role."

Through it all, Wieser said he learned not to take anything for granted, because an actor always is working.

"Every emotion, action, thought or memory can help and teach us as actors and people," he said.

"I made good contacts, and genuine friends, and I'll always remember the community we made."

Electronic group's debut album shows promise for future works

Justice, "Cross"

Album review by Mark Sibilla

Within the vast genre of electronic music, there are certain sub-genres that lend themselves to album format much better than others. House music, a style of electronic music heavily indebted to funk and disco, is more of a singles-oriented genre. That is, many house DJs and producers rely on singles and remixes more than albums, because it is often difficult to sustain the high energy of a house party over the course of a full album.

"Cross," the debut of French house production duo Justice is one house album that approaches the musical highs and innovations of such seminal house albums as Daft Punk's "Discovery" and Basement Jaxx's "Remedy." Xavier de Rosnay and Gaspard Augé have cut their teeth with singles like "Waters of Nazareth" as well as remixing songs for bands and artists like Franz Ferdinand, Britney Spears and N.E.R.D.

The standout track on "Cross" is the pervasively catchy single "D.A.N.C.E.," which sounds like a reimagining of the Jackson 5 as a disco band. In addition to the four-on-the-floor beat, soaring disco strings and funky bass (an obvious homage to Quincy Jones' production work with Michael Jackson), the song lyrically honors the Jackson clan with lines like, "You were such a P.Y.T. catching all the lights/ Just easy as A-B-C that's how you make it right."

The album contains two other tracks with vocals, "Tt-hee Ppaarrttyy" and "DVNO." The former is a rather weak offering with limp rapping from French rapper Uffie, while the latter is a goofy, endearing track sung by DVNO proclaiming there is "no need to ask (his) name to figure out how cool (he is)." The song is particularly memorable for its slap-bass breakdown around the three-minute mark.

The remainder of "Cross" is instrumental, but that should not be considered synonymous with uninteresting. The album opens with the appropriately titled "Genesis." The song begins grandly with pounding tympans, blaring horns and menacing synthesizer lines that bring to mind Richard Strauss' "Also Sprach Zarathustra." This segues into an abrasive, yet accessible, bass synthesizer line that leads the listener through a variety of added sounds including electronic squelches and heavily processed vocals.

"Let There Be Light," the album's second track, rides in on a sixteenth-note hi-hat rhythm that introduces various pitched electronic squawks that shares the melody with an extremely jittery bass. It is an exciting track that makes odd sounds catchy and listenable.

Other album highlights include the two-part "Phantom" composition during the album's midsection. "Phantom" lays down the groundwork: heavy kick-drum beats coupled with dueling sounds. It is difficult to distinguish whether they are heavily processed vocals or electronically created noises. "Phantom Pt. II" ups the ante by adding stings to counter the slap-bass and fuzzed-out squeaks and swirls.

"Cross" ends strongly with "Stress" and the previously released single, "Waters of Nazareth." "Waters of Nazareth" is an excellent song, but for my money, "Stress" is the superior track. "Stress" is aptly titled. With its spastic strings sampled from "Night On a Disco Mountain," dentist-drill synths and random bursts of feedback, the song sounds like a stressed-out brain might look as it fires synapses haphazardly and erratically while it tries to deal with its environment.

Justice has accomplished a feat few producers and DJs can: create an engaging, creative and entirely danceable album. With a debut album like "Cross," I can only be excited to see what this highly talented duo has in store for us next time.

FIRE | Iron-pour groups try to be inclusive with membership several weeks of preparation also are necessary, Hunt said. Artists break the coke pieces and scrap metal from cast-iron heating radiators in houses. The furnace and ladles are relined; propane and other necessary tools also are gathered prior to the pour, Hunt said.

Artists from the United Kingdom and K-State drawing-class students also developed patterns and made ceramic molds for the iron, which is a lengthy process by itself, Hunt said.

At 7 a.m. during an all-day pour, Hunt said the artists place the molds and furnace on a sand bed outside. After the pour, the molds are broken from the castings. The gating systems — the casts' cups that the iron is poured into — are removed with a grinder, he said.

During a continuous pour, about 2,000 pounds of iron are melted and poured into casts. About 5,000 pounds of iron were melted in 2 1/2 hours of actual pouring Friday afternoon, Hunt said.

"It's more of a dance, and we like that," he said.

Artists from across the country — and the Atlantic Ocean — attended Friday's pour at K-State, including students and faculty members from New Mexico, Arizona, Georgia, Missouri, Illinois, California, West Wales in Great Britain and other Kansas universities.

"Everybody comes, and we're all rocking," Hunt said. "It's a venue to get a bunch of students and colleagues together and make a sculpture."

EMBRACING THE SUBCULTURE

The artists display their T-shirts with messages like "unity thru fire" and "iron is thicker than blood." Men and women alike wear welders' overalls and steel-toed boots. Construction helmets with face masks will protect their heads from the highest point of combustion — 3,200 degrees Fahrenheit.

There is a subculture surrounding cast iron and its art form, which has a sense of community and comradeship, said Casey Westbrook, assistant professor of art.

"We are very dependent on each other to make the process work," he said. "We have to like each other — or pretend to like each other — to make it work."

While the art form is a subculture, it is not new. During the Fourth Dynasty, the Chinese developed the cast-iron pour process, Hunt said. The English perfected it in the mid-1700s, which transitioned into the Industrial Revolution, he said.

"What we're doing isn't anything new," he said. "We're just borrowing from history and making art with it."

While Hunt first got involved with cast iron in 1987, he said it took him 12 years to embrace the material with his artistic ideas. Cast iron has certain qualities that materials like bronze and aluminum do not, he said.

Since initiating cast-iron pouring at K-State in 2000, Hunt said he has taken art students to different events in Texas, New Mexico, Arizona

Cast-iron pouring involves melting iron at temperatures of 2,500 degrees Fahrenheit and then pouring it into sculptures or molds made by art students.

Christopher Hanewinkel and New Jersey. He also has conducted four workshops in the United Kingdom with Westbrook.

Pour events also provide networking opportunities, which Westbrook said is crucial in the young artists' development.

"It's a huge information exchange — some come from industrial settings while others offer a more technical component," Westbrook said. "It's more conclusive than being taught by one professor in the department."

Sarah Lomasney, senior in fine arts and sculpture, said while she had participated in cast-iron pours before, Friday's event was the first one she had a piece of art in. The entire day is process-driven and dependent, Lomasney said.

"If a mold breaks or something happens before the iron is even ready, you won't have an end piece," she said. "It's dependent on luck."

Lomasney said her favorite aspect of cast-iron pour events is the interaction with visiting artists. She also said she plans to continue cast-iron pouring after college because it is one of her favorite events during the year.

"It's a lot of people getting together and doing a lot of work for one afternoon," she said.

PHYSICAL DEMANDS, POSSIBLE DANGERS

Coolers of water surround the pour site while Hunt encourages the artists to "breathe deep." Red tape that reads "designated area" keeps spectators away from the potential dangers associated with the iron-pour process.

Since starting cast-iron pour events at K-State seven years ago, Hunt said no significant accidents have occurred, though everyone experiences minor burns.

The art form is physically demanding but not to the point that it is exclusionary, Hunt said. Two people lift the ladles, which weigh between 100-150 pounds and contain 160-220 pounds of metal.

"There is a lot of testosterone, but I am way against that machismo attitude," he said. "We want to be as inclusive as possible."

Crew members also are ready to pour sand on the casts if the molten metal is spilled. Molten metal is not chemically attracted to water, and cement contains a great deal of water, Hunt said. If the molten metal sits on the cement, it will generate steam and explode, he said.

Despite potential safety risks associated with pouring, Hunt said he possesses a "chill attitude" during the process, which other cultures across the world have complimented him on.

"There's no reason to get excited," he said. "Yeah, it's iron and it's dangerous, but that's part of the fun. Just relax, and do it."

NOTES | Backups doing well

Part of the reason, Prince said, is a new NCAA rule that moved kickoffs back five yards to the 30-yard line.

"Some things we need to work with is our kickoff return unit is not where it has been, and our coverage is not where it has been," Prince said. "We have not adjusted well to the new rule. This has not helped us. This is something we need to continue to try to improve."

"Basically, our kickoff returns are what is being returned against us, and that's not a situation that we've had since we've been here."

DEFENSE IS BULKING UP

A very positive note, Prince said, was the non-star's play on defense in Saturday's win.

"For the second-straight week, we had two nonstar's play terrific on defense," he said. "A week ago, it was (Chris) Carney and (John) Houlik; this week it was (Ross) Diehl and (Andrew) Erker. That's exactly the kind of development that we need."

"We need to find the same kind of development on the defensive line as we try to get more people involved so we can find the kind of depth to be able to finish the season."

Diehl had three tackles and two sacks for a loss for nine yards total. Erker had four tackles and two assists during Saturday's game. Steven Clinch, Houlik and Eric Childs

SAGGING | Cities nationwide consider legislation

While this punishment ultimately could raise money for cities and ban exposed thongs during highway cleanups, more drastic routes are being taken elsewhere.

In cities where the ban already has passed, like Delcambre, La., a penalty for exposing any underwear, including bra straps, can carry a fine of up to $500 and six months in jail, according to the AP article. In Atlanta, the ban even would include women's sports bras.

In Shreveport, bikinis have been outlawed as well, Walford said.

"I don't want to see young people wind up with a police record over something like this," Walford said, "but it is the law, and they're going to have to follow it now."

The ban as stated in the Atlanta bill includes any "indecent exposure of undergarments," and the ordinance, if passed, would be under the same city code that prohibits sex in public and indecent exposure of or fondling of the genitals.

Critics, however, wonder how the law will be enforced.

"It's going to be difficult to justify what is an undergarment," said student body president Matt Wagner. "How is an officer going to justify and regulate that? How do the officers define what is appropriate and allowed?"

To keep people from not wearing underwear to avoid being fined, bills like Shreveport's ban any exposure of skin below the waist.

"What is the legal definition of the waist?" Walford asked. "It's a fair question that I don't even know the answer to. It's arbitrary."

Another issue raised is the concern that police officials should be spending their time and energy on issues that endanger society, not patrolling the streets for people in low-slung jeans.

"It's a silly fashion, but I think it will pass," Walford said. "I'm sorry that we decided to legislate fashion."

Considering many cities in Louisiana are debating this ban, many critics cite hurricane relief as a more pressing issue that should take precedence.

"It surprised me to learn that a town hall meeting (about the ban) was held in a trailer because of the hurricane effects," Wagner said, "and I'm thinking, 'Is this something we should be concerned about, or rather the issues at hand with the welfare of the community?'"

Though every city has its own reasons for the ban, the general consensus is that older adults, like the council members who are proposing and passing these bills, are just plain tired of seeing low-riding pants that are belted at the knees, Webb said.

"It's just gotten ridiculous how low the kids are wearing their pants," Webb said. "People are constantly approaching me and wishing somebody would do something about it. We felt it was a worthy ordinance to put in place."

From there, it was a domino effect. Residents of one city saw another city vote on the bill and decided it was time to do something about it in their town too.

"It's a shame that it had to come to this," Webb said. "People should take more pride in the way they dress and present themselves."

Whether this ban makes its way to the Midwest, some feel that it will not take long for it to be challenged in court.

"It will be up to the courts to decide whether or not we can legislate fashion," Walford said.

Others are concerned with the message: telling citizens what they can and cannot wear.

"It is simply a cultural difference that these people are looking at and saying is wrong," Wagner said. "But we have to encourage cultural differences."

- Sept. 17.

A constitution quiz also was administered at the Union Food Court Monday afternoon. Participants received booklet copies of the Constitution and "I (heart) the Constitution" buttons.

Heather Reed, assistant dean of student life, said Constitution Day is important because U.S. citizens should be knowledgeable of the Constitution and have an active voice in society.

"We all need to be participants in our democratic process," Reed said.

University administrators hope to bring the Kansas Court of Appeals, which made a presentation during the 2006 Constitution

Day, back to K-State next year. Constitution Day event planners also hope to partner with a university lecture series to bring in high-profile speakers who related to the Constitution, she said.

In regard to the Patriot Act, Reed said it is important to examine both sides of the act and balance the nation's security with the possibility of infringement on U.S. citizens' rights.

"With domestic spying, the Patriot Act and the steps that have been taken to protect us from threats of terrorism, you need to look at both sides of the issue," Reed said. "I thought it was interesting when they talked about the basis for the act in regard to national security and safety."

K-State will receive more than $12 million for deferred maintenance projects across the campus. Of the buildings receiving most of the funds are Willard Hall, West Stadium and Leasure Hall. K-State is receiving more money for maintenance than the other universities in Kansas.

Ordinances dictate city lawns' appearance

By Mark Wampler
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

If a family of crocodiles made its way from Florida into a Manhattan resident's swimming pool, Manhattan has a city ordinance that provides a quick solution to the problem: It is legal to empty the pool into a neighbor's yard to get rid of the crocodiles.

According to city laws, "diverting large amounts of water" into a neighboring yard is considered a civil and personal matter, and the city will not get involved.

While this problem probably will never happen to most students, the city does have several everyday ordinances that people must follow, said Brad Klausen, building official of Manhattan.

The city requires grass to be less than a foot tall, trash to be picked up in the yard and houses to have proper surface coating, such as paint on wood.

"We send out notices that the lawn needs to be cut if it's over 12 inches," Klausen said.

"If it doesn't get done, we have a contractor we send who will mow the lawn, and the owner will get billed."

Eddie Eastes, Manhattan park superintendent, said determining what needs to be mowed can be a tricky process.

"Landscapes can pose a problem, such as what is to be considered flowers and bushes," he said.

Other lawn infractions also can result in fines.

Indoor furniture and trash on the lawn are what Klausen referred to as "nuisance problems," which can be fined, and another ordinance says it is illegal to push snow into the street from private property.

The city employs one full-time and one part-time inspector to keep the neighborhoods looking nice, Klausen said.

However, a majority of the issues come from neighbors complaints.

"It's OK to have parties," Klausen said. "Just pick up afterwards."

Tyler Whetstone, junior in industrial engineering, said the city enforced its laws a little too strictly on his house last year.

"Last year one of our neighbors left a tire on our lawn, and we got in trouble for not getting it out of there,"

State universities receive funds for deferred maintenance

By Adrienne DeWeese
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Financial support exists for deferred maintenance backlog at Kansas Board of Regents universities — for now.

K-State received more than $12.5 million of the more than $38 million that state universities received for 50 deferred maintenance projects.

K-State's deferred-maintenance-to-do list includes five projects — utility infrastructures/power plant improvements; renovate academic spaces in Old Memorial Stadium; Leasure Hall; Willard Hall; Seaton Court; and roofs and other projects on campus.

Installation of a new boiler at K-State's central power plant is scheduled to start in January, said Ed Heptig, director of facilities maintenance.

The Division of Facilities signed with an engineering firm last week to start design plans. After the winter season, Heptig also said facilities plans to work on the deteriorating and leaking sections of the 80-year-old steam distribution lines.

Facilities' workers plan to work between classes and other building activities during the maintenance projects, Heptig said.

While K-State received funding to help with deferred maintenance, Heptig said the funding will not have a significant effect on the amount that exists on campus.

"Obviously, anytime I get funding to help me maintain anything on campus, I think it's great," Heptig said. "It won't make a dent in the deferred maintenance — not only are we getting the funding, but every other state university is getting funding, too."

The Regents formally approved the five-year maintenance project plans for each state university in June. Last month, the Kansas Legislature's Joint Committee on State Building Construction also formally passed out the first year of the state-university maintenance projects as "reviewed favorably," according to a Sept. 12 Regents press release.

The committee's formal review officially allows the universities to begin work on their campuses, according to the press release.

The five-year infrastructure funding plan — which started with fiscal year 2008 — provides $90 million in direct state funds and about $44 million in retained-interest earning to the Regents' universities. It also provides up to $158 million in private contribution generated through state-funded tax credits.

If these separate funding mechanisms are fully realized, the legislation will allow the state universities to address about 38 percent of the $663 million maintenance backlog that now exists, according to the Regents Web site.

While he said he thinks the tax-incentive plan will generate more funding. Facilities Director Ed Rice said he hopes the Kansas legislature allocates additional funding for deferred maintenance.

Water damage to some of the ceiling tiles in West Stadium are some of the few repairs needed. Others include plumbing and structural improvements.

"We're looking at quite a backlog of deferred maintenance," he said. "This will be a good start on it, though."

An additional $100 million in interest-free bonding authority will be available to Washburn University in Topeka, 19 community colleges and five technical colleges in Kansas.

Gov. Kathleen Sebelius signed House Bill 2237 into law on May 14 after deferred maintenance received significant emphasis during Silver Key Honorary members sleep outside to raise funds for Manhattan homeless

By Elise Podhajsky
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Students lounged on sleeping bags, blankets and pillows while socializing, catching up on homework and enjoying a little live entertainment last night in Bosco Student Plaza.

The students were there for Silver Key's Sleep Out for the Homeless event to raise funds for their cause.

Silver Key, K-State's sophomore honorary program, holds the event each year to raise money for the Manhattan Emergency Shelter as well as raise awareness of the city's homeless population.

Abby Guenther, Silver Key president, said the group raised funds for the shelter to expand and move from its 831 Leavenworth address to a new building at 4th and Yuma downtown.

"Since Sept. 1, (the shelter) has already had to turn away 50 people," Guenther said. "Homelessness is becoming a bigger problem here than people realize."

Silver Key Vice President Ann Virgo said students began raising money for the event last semester, continued through the summer and concluded this morning. Virgo, sophomore in nonprofit marketing, said the members asked for donations while visiting residential areas, friends, faculty members, the greek community and businesses throughout the city including Wal-Mart, Target and all stores in the Aggieville Business Association.

"There's hundreds of homeless in the Manhattan area," Virgo said. "We're fundraising not just for the homeless but specifically for the Manhattan Emergency Shelter. Those funds are going to help buy personal hygiene products, food, clothing and also to expand the shelter."

Silver Key members stayed around the plaza all night while they studied, ate free Pita Pit, listened to a few speakers and were entertained by the K-State Multicultural Dance Society. Speakers included the

STUDENT TASERED, ARRESTED

GAINESVILLE, Fla. — The University of Florida asked state investigators Tuesday to review campus officers' use of a Taser on a persistent questioner — who is known for posting practical jokes online — during a forum with Sen. John Kerry.

Video of Monday's takedown of the 21-year-old student was replayed extensively on TV and the Internet. University President Bernie Machen called the confrontation regretful and said two officers were placed on administrative leave pending the outcome of the probe.

The student, Andrew Meyer, spent a night in jail before his release Tuesday morning on his recognizance. He had no comment when he left. His attorney, Robert Griscti, said he might speak with reporters later Tuesday but had no immediate comment.

Some Florida students reacted angrily to the arrest, planning protests and possible sit-ins against alleged police brutality.

University police said in a news release that officers had been summoned by the forum's sponsors to escort Meyer from the building. They added that Meyer was Tasered because he resisted when officers were attempting to place him in handcuffs.

DOLE RECALLS SALADS

MONTEREY, Calif. — Dole Fresh Vegetables is recalling about 800 cases of salads shipped throughout the United States and Canada after Canadian government testing revealed contamination with a deadly strain of E. coli bacteria.

The Canadian government issued a warning Sunday to consumers, telling them not to eat "Dole Hearts Delight" brand bagged salad after random tests it conducted came back positive for E. coli O157:H7.

The contaminated salad was processed in Springfield, Ill., from romaine, green leaf and butter lettuces grown in Ohio, Colorado and California's Central Coast region, said Marty Ordman, spokesman for Dole Food Co. Inc. But neither government agencies nor Dole on Monday could state the source of contamination or say how the bagged salads became contaminated.

No illnesses have been reported. "Our overriding concern is for consumer safety," said Eric Schwartz, president of Monterey-based Dole Fresh Vegetables, in a published statement.

The Canadian advisory comes little more than a year after a devastating outbreak of E. coli O157:H7 in Dole bagged spinach killed at least three people and sickened more than 200 in 26 states and Canada. The spinach was eventually traced back to a field in San Benito County that sat near a cattle ranching operation. E. coli O157:H7 originates in the intestines of cattle and can be spread through their feces.

DALLAS INKS JOHNSON

IRVING, Texas — Tank Johnson, serving an eight-game ban from the National Football League for personal conduct issues, inked a two-year contract with the Dallas Cowboys on Tuesday.

Financial terms were not disclosed, but the Fort Worth Star-Telegram reported on its Web site that Johnson agreed to a two-year deal, annually worth the league minimum of $510,000.

But the newspaper also reported that Johnson could make a large sum in incentives next season, though he did not receive a signing bonus.

Johnson still must serve six more games of an eight-game suspension handed down by NFL commissioner Roger Goodell for violating the league's personal conduct policy.

Goodell did leave the possibility open of reducing Johnson's suspension to six games.

But Johnson's chances of seeing his sanction reduced took a hit when he was pulled over in June for driving while impaired, though those charges were dropped.

Following the incident in Arizona, Johnson was released by the Chicago Bears on June 25.

If Goodell upholds the suspension, the earliest Johnson could play for the Cowboys would be Nov. 11 against the New York Giants.

Should the suspension be reduced, he could play on October 21 against the Minnesota Vikings.

The Cowboys were in need of a defensive tackle after 10-year veteran Jason Ferguson suffered a torn biceps in the first half of their season-opening win over the Giants. He is out for the season.

Activist discusses Universal Declaration of Human Rights in lecture

By Adrienne DeWeese
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Identity politics often make it difficult to build a human-rights movement in modern society, said the national coordinator of the SisterSong Women of Color Reproductive Health Collective on Tuesday night.

"We can all focus on that issue that we're passionate about, but we can do it in a way using the human-rights' framework that causes us to build a united movement for human rights versus separated movements based on identity politics," said Loretta Ross to a packed Forum Hall during the first Lou Douglas Lecture Series on Public Issues of the 2007-08 academic year.

The United States often uses its human rights in an ineffective manner against countries across the world, Ross said in her lecture "Bringing Human Rights Home."

"We tend to use human rights as a bully weapon to beat up on other countries about their alleged human rights' record while we are the worst performing country in the world when it comes to upholding and ratifying human-rights' treaties," Ross said.

While Ross said she had heard the phrase "human rights" throughout her life, she did not learn its meaning until speaking with the Rev. C.T. Vivian, who was a close friend of Martin Luther King Jr. during the Civil Rights Movement.

Ross also said it is hard for citizens to fight for rights they are unaware of. After asking audience members who could name the eight rights outlined in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, no one raised their hands.

The declaration, an advisory declaration that the UN General Assembly adopted in 1948, originally consisted of five human-rights' categories — civil, political, economic, social and cultural rights.

"It was probably our proudest moment in foreign policy," she said.

During the 1970s, three additional rights were added — environmental, developmental and sexual.

After outlining the human rights, Ross posed a question to the audience that was met with immediate applause: "If every human being has a right to education, why are we paying for it?"

While she said she grew up with a conservative background, Ross became a political activist at age 15 when she was kicked out of high school for her pregnancy. After her parents sued the school and settled out of court, Ross said she was allowed to attend school but could not participate in any extracurricular activities because she no longer had "moral character."

Speaking to a packed audience in Forum Hall in the K-State Student Union, Loretta Ross, speaks about her past experiences that made her want to be an activist. Ross spoke about human rights at 7 p.m. Tuesday and then had a question-and-answer session.

Ross was one of the first black women to direct a rape crisis center in the 1970s. She also served as national co-director of the April 25 March for Women's Lives in Washington, D.C., in 2004, which is the largest protest march in U.S. history with more than 1 million participants.

Ross's lecture, which UFM sponsored, was part of the 19th-annual Community Cultural Harmony Week. Linda Teener, UFM executive director, said the Lou Douglas Lecture Series features speakers whose views are different from those often heard in Kansas.

"We don't often hear the perspective Ross brought in, and we don't often hear about human rights in Kansas," Teener said.

Brett Kelly, freshman in biology, said he had not heard of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights prior to Ross's lecture. Human rights and other issues addressed in Ross's lecture affect students because of the diverse environment often found on college campuses, Kelly said.

"You have to accept people the way they are and try to find a common ground," he said. "You often don't see a lot of that in Kansas."

City commission renews contract with insurance firm

By Nicholas Birdsong
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

City commissioners unanimously voted to accept Sunflower Insurance Group's offer to insure city property at the City Commission meeting Tuesday night at City Hall.

Commissioners accepted the insurance company's bid of $31,100, which will provide insurance coverage for all the city's property.

"It's the whole picture," said Cathy Harms, director of Human Resources and risk manager for the Sunflower Insurance Group.

"Casualty insurance — all of the city buildings and vehicles will be covered."

Commissioner Mark Hatesohl asked Harms if health insurance would be covered by the agreement, but Harms said only casualty insurance will be covered on personnel.

The group has provided insurance to Manhattan since September 2004, city officials said.

The previous agreement, which was for three years of coverage, was set to expire on Dec. 31, 2007.

City leaders called the weekly commission meeting to a close earlier than usual for a private executive session.

This session was a closed-door event that discussed legal matters deemed confidential by City Attorney Bill Frost.

K-state family day
Saturday, September 22, 2007

FROM THE PRESIDENT

K-State officials to address WebMail concerns soon

Many students have approached student government leaders in the past few weeks about the Web-Mail network at K-State being either unresponsive or slow.

MATT WAGNER
After speaking with Lynn Carlin, interim vice provost for technology, and James Lyall, associate vice provost for technology, about the issue, they have decided to form two ad-hoc committees.

The first committee will research future needs of information technology for the campus, and another committee will try to understand the needs of existing constituents on the WebMail system at K-State and what future direction e-mail services at K-State should take.

Vice President Lydia Peele and I have placed our Technology Coordinator from the SGA Cabinet to serve as the student representative.

The SGA University Relations Committee also will follow up with administrators and students on the progress with both of these committees. Any student wishing to provide input, comments or concerns with technology on campus, please don't hesitate to contact an SGA member.

Next week, SGA will sponsor the C-SPAN Presidential Campaign 2008 bus on campus. Cox Communications and C-SPAN will bring the bus to campus and would like to showcase students taking tours of the campaign bus on Thursday, Sept. 27 for the C-SPAN news.

The campaign bus will be parked on the east side of Ahearn Field House. Students, faculty and the public are encouraged to take a tour from noon to 4 p.m. and learn more about the 2008 Presidential Campaign. Students will also have the opportunity to register to vote.

Rewriting history

Many think words 'church and state' are in constitution

An Arizona church moving from Tempe to Chandler has requested to borrow $5 million in tax-exempt industrial development bonds. These IDA bonds are sold by the government and designed to attract commerce and jobs.

While the church plans to build a college and residence hall, the bonds will be used for the infrastructure and athletic fields, according to the Rev. Mike Sproul. The idea of government bonds being used for the building of religious facilities does not make all the citizens of Chandler happy, including Marc Victor, a criminal defense attorney who is publicly swearing to oppose the move.

"It's nothing more than using government to advance and promote religion," the defense attorney said.

Victor also said if the government distributes these bonds to the church, it is violating the constitutional requirement of separation of church and state.

What Victor is referring to is the First Amendment, which states, "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion; or prohibiting the free exercise of." Where the defense attorney's argument – and every left-winger's argument for that matter – falls short is the words "church and state" never once appear in the constitution.

CHUCK ARMSTRONG

Well, let me rephrase my statement; those words never appear in the United States' Constitution. They do, however, appear in the former Soviet Union's constitution, under Article 124.

Individuals get confused with the idea of separation of church and state because of a letter Thomas Jefferson wrote 11 years after the ratification of the U.S. Constitution.

In the letter, Jefferson wrote there needs to be "a wall of separation between church and state" so the government would not create a federal religion like the Church of England.

Gregg Jackson, a nationally acclaimed talk-radio host and author, said Jefferson's intent with the letter was to "assure that the individual members of a state ... would be able to freely worship and practice as they saw fit."

These words have been manipulated overtime and wrongly associated with the U.S. Constitution (Jefferson had absolutely nothing to do with the constitution.)

"The First Amendment guarantees freedom of religion not freedom from religion," said Jackson. "The Left has been using a Soviet Union doctrine ... to advance the notion that religion has no place in public."

Does this mean the church automatically should receive the governmental bonds? Not necessarily – that is up to the government to decide.

What it does mean, though, is a defense attorney's argument that the church does not deserve the IDA bonds based solely on the reason of a so-called constitutional mandate is ridiculous, not to mention completely inaccurate.

The government has every right to hand out money to churches if it decides to. There is no justifying a separation of church and state.

TO THE POINT

Don't expect overnight changes

Now that the Kansas Legislature has pledged more than $200 million to address the state's deferred maintenance issue, it's tempting to think you'll never have to deal with another overflowing toilet, graffiti-covered desk or crumbling ceiling.

But we should all keep one important point in mind: This is the government we're talking about. Things are never quite as simple as they seem.

While $200 million seems like a lot of money to college students subsisting on ramen noodles and frozen pizza, it doesn't scratch the surface of Kansas' deferred-maintenance crisis.

In 2006, a comprehensive facilities audit of Kansas Board of Regents universities revealed a maintenance backlog bigger than the New York Yankees' payroll – somewhere in the neighborhood of $727 million. The current plan provides funding for less than 40 percent of the existing maintenance issues.

The money is divided between the six Regents universities and paid out through a five-year installment plan. While K-State got the biggest piece of the pie – $12 million and change in Year 1 – it's still spread dangerously thin.

K-State's chunk of the money will go to a number of projects, including renovations at Memorial Stadium, Willard Hall and Seaton Court, which is older than some Mesozoic fossils.

While this down payment is a step in the right direction, we haven't heard the last of this deferred-maintenance crisis. Chances are, we'll be long gone before we see any substantial progress.

So get used to those Pink Floyd lyrics scrawled all over your desk.

No woman should endure pain of rape by stranger or friend

As Gandhi once said, "Be the change you hope to see in the world."

Rape can occur anywhere, and can be anything from stranger rape to sadistic marital rape. No one is immune to this horrible problem of self-control and lack of respect, decency and honesty. This can turn into an overflow of hatred and disgust that someone can feel for years. Rape and incest is emotional cancer, which will not go away without help.

A woman referred to in court as Jane Doe is suing Warren Jeffs, a religious polygamist sect leader from the Fundamentalist Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints. Jeffs, once on the FBI's 10 Most Wanted List, used religious teachings to pressure Doe into marrying her cousin. This case is not necessarily about the idea of marrying her cousin but an issue of rape.

At the time Doe was forced into an arranged marriage, she was 19 years old, but she said in her testimony she didn't even know what sex was.

Doe testified in court that she had said, "I don't know what you are doing and I'm really uncomfortable, so please stop."

The Associated Press reported after her husband refused to stop, she swallowed two bottles of over-the-counter pain medicine to ease her emotional pain. This kind of horrific sex, or sadistic rape, continued throughout her marriage.

Rape is a betrayal of trust, says Hidden Hurt, an abuse information and support Web site based in the United Kingdom. It is so destructive because it betrays the fundamental basis of the marital relationship.

Women should be able to walk around any city without the thought that harm might come to them. Unfortunately, this is not the world we live in. This issue hits us hard, even in our own city.

Statistically speaking, one in six women will be victims of sexual assault in their lifetime, according to the Rape, Abuse, and Incest National Network. Every two and a half minutes in America, someone is assaulted. RAINN states 59 percent of sexual assaults go unreported. Without reporting sexual assault, we are assisting the perpetrators.

Women have rights in this country. One of these personal rights is the right to believe her body is a sacred temple.

It is not about how "slutty" a woman dresses or if she acts like she "deserves" it; no one in this world should have to endure such pain.

Students gain experience with work on solar house project

By Joseph Chapes
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

An electric saw buzzes and the smell of sweat permeates the air as a group of students swarm around what looks like an oddly-shaped mobile home while hammering, sanding and carrying wood.

A few of the students stand at one of the corners of the structure, which has sagged during construction, and debate what needs to be done.

Elsewhere, a perspiring student notes that the water cooler is empty and another passes out cookies. This is not your normal construction site.

"This project is a lot of things, but it ain't a union job," said Andrew Becker, senior in architecture and one of the student workers.

THE PROJECT

This scene is part of K-State's Project Solar House, a volunteer student effort to construct a solar-powered building for the National Solar Decathlon competition Oct. 12-20 in Washington, D.C.

The project is sponsored by the U.S. Department of Energy and National Renewable Energy Laboratory.

Todd Gabbard, assistant professor of architecture, said the contest challenges university teams to design and build a house that can do anything a normal house can do — but by using only solar power.

Gabbard and Ruth Miller, associate professor of electrical engineering, are the project administrators of the student project.

K-State is one of 20 schools across the nation involved in the contest, which include Texas A&M University, MIT, New York Institute of Technology and Santa Clara University.

The project started in January 2006 when K-State was accepted into the competition. After the design and logistics were worked out for the house, construction began in April 2007, and it will finish at the end of September.

Painting the deck to the Solar House, Lindsay Whitehead, junior in architecture, helps other architecture students work on the house.

After it is completed, the house will be transported to Washington, D.C.

HANDS-ON LEARNING

Brad Lutz, senior in electrical engineering, has been involved with the project from the beginning.

"We've looked at paper for a year," he said. "Now that it's actually becoming a reality and something you can actually put your hands on and actually see happening, it's really exciting."

Lutz is one of more than 100 architecture and engineering students who have been involved in the project. He became involved in February 2006 and eventually took charge of the solar system design and installation.

"The personal development you achieve through a project like this — working with people, having a schedule and meeting deadlines — I think the skills and knowledge I've gained through this has been the most enjoyable thing," Lutz said.

During the project, students have to learn how to collaborate in the design and construction of the house to ensure all the elements and systems came together.

"I think everyone involved has learned something from the experience," Gabbard said. "If they come out here to help with the construction or they're just trying to solve a very specific real world problem, they are getting some experience they would not otherwise get in a normal university setting."

BEING AN EXAMPLE

One of the main goals of the project was to build a house that could be an example that shows renewable energy is possible in Kansas and uses elements that represent the state, like reclaimed barnwood and local types of wood.

After the building is completed, these energy-efficient elements will be demonstrated in the National Mall in Washington, D.C., as part of the Solar Decathlon contest in October.

According to the Solar Decathlon Web site, the power output of the house will be tested by running appliances, computers and heating and cooling systems during the competition. The house will be judged by teams of architects and engineers.

After the contest, the house will be returned to K-State and displayed to the public to demonstrate that solar power is a viable alternative to electricity created by fossil fuels.

With the rise in the price of energy, the solar panels and other energy-efficient elements of the house will become more important in the future.

Gabbard said he hopes the solar house will be the start of a new focus on sustainable research at K-State.

"I think it's time that K-State steps up and shows that it can be a leader in the march toward a sustainable nation," he said. "Just to have this artifact, this house that runs entirely on solar power here, will kind of start the conversation on solar power and renewable energy here in Kansas."

SOLAR HOUSE FACTS

— Jim McCullough, owner of McCullough Development in Manhattan, donated the site where the Project Solar House group is building an 800-square-foot solar house. Most of the materials being used to build the house were donated.

— The solar panels are located on the south side of the house — the optimum angle for solar panels in the winter when energy demand is the highest.

— The direct current electricity from the solar panel goes through an inverter that is converted to alternate current electricity, which goes into the house.

— The alternate current electricity is the kind of electricity typically used in solar households.

— Sometimes the solar panel provides more energy than the house requires, and the excess power from the solar panel is stored into direct current batteries.

— The building automation system regulates the solar panels and is controlled with a wireless computer, enabling the homeowner to adjust and monitor the temperature, humidity and amount of light in any room in the house where energy is being used.

— Reflecting pools that scatter light into the windows and help give the rooms more light are beneath the windows in the house.

— On the west side of the solar house is a window with a view of the house's Zen garden with accent lighting that resembles a conventional fireplace when illuminated.

— The exterior of the house has thick walls made from structurally insulated panels. The SIPs have 8-inch polystyrene foam, which are between two layers of plywood.

— The foam is more insulated than fiberglass, which is the material commonly used to build walls for most homes.

— The R-value, which indicates resistance to heat flow, for a home with fiberglass walls is 19. The R-value on the sides of the solar house is 35, and the R-value on the roof is 42.

— This means the solar house is using less energy than a typical home because it allows a smaller amount of heat flow to enter the house.

— The only part of the house that uses fiberglass on the walls is the hallway.

YOUR HEALTH

Students must set workout goals

Most people I know work out to reach some goal. Whether they're busting their butt for the next body-building competition or just trying to lose those extra pounds they picked up somewhere between the K-State Student Union food court and Call Hall, a goal is a goal.

One of the most-asked questions that personal trainers answer is "How soon will I see results?" There really isn't an easy answer.

How your body reacts to exercise is unique to you. It's how you measure your steps along the way that will help you determine if you are on track.

First of all, if your fitness goal is to lose weight and you still don't know where the Peters Recreation Complex is located, you're in a bit of trouble. Your first step needs to be to get started.

If you've gotten past that point which, believe it or not, might be the hardest obstacle of all, then the next thing you have to ask yourself is, "Do I know what the heck I'm doing?" If you are lifting the same way you lifted when you were on the track team in high school, then probably not.

Weight lifting is not an innate instinct. It's pretty easy to pick up a dumbbell, but it's a whole other story to lift it in a way that will actually benefit you. This is where personal trainers or fitness instructors come in.

Hire a trainer to take you around the weight room, show you good form or just come up with an exercise program that fits your goals. If you don't have the money to hire a trainer, then take a group fitness class like Rep Revolution. You can take the exercises you learn in the class and apply them to the weight room.

Once you learn how to exercise correctly, you need to learn how to measure your progress. If you are just stepping on the scale, you could be waiting a few weeks before your numbers start to decline. Especially if you added weight training to your exercise routine, you might notice you are gaining weight. As discouraging as you might find that to be at first, go try on some pants.

That's right; go try on some pants. Even if the scale says nothing has changed, your clothes might disagree. Often, people start building muscle, which weighs more than fat. So you may look and feel "tighter" but not weigh any less. Trying on clothes that now fit a little better is a great way to determine if you are gaining muscle.

As great as muscle gain might be, some people are still fixated on what the scale says. Do not cut out your weight training. You will reach a point in a few weeks when you start losing weight because your muscle gain has reached a plateau. Losing about two pounds a week is healthy — much more than that is not.

Also keep in mind that people are very likely to set a target weight that is much too low to be healthy. Be realistic when setting goals.

If you think all this is a little more than you can handle on your own, get a personal trainer. Let someone who is trained to help you set and reach goals handle the math. If you suspect you need a reality check, or you aren't even sure what your goal should be, start talking to people who can help you make a healthy decision. Your best friend might be as skinny as Nicole Richie, but she might not be the best person to get you to your goal weight in a healthy way.

Mistakes on green cost men's golf team in final round

By Mike DeVader
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

After the first tournament of the year, the K-State men's golf team might want to follow an example from professional golfer Tiger Woods.

Woods made 63 of his 67 putts inside 10 feet at the Tour Championship last weekend in Atlanta. Woods won the tournament with a score of 23-under par.

The Wildcats, meanwhile, finished fourth at the Kansas Invitational with a score of 34-over par, largely because they struggled on the greens. The Wildcats were just five strokes out of first after one day of competition but slipped to fourth after posting a team score of 303 on the final 18 holes.

"We need to realize that no one will give us the tournament," coach Tim Norris said. "We need to make sure that we go out and take it."

Freshman Kyle Smell shot a five-over 221 — the best score of any K-State golfer.

It wasn't the best performance for the K-State women's golf team, but Coach Kristi Knight said the Wildcats came away from the Ron Moore Intercollegiate with a clear idea of where they need to improve.

Knight said K-State's problems are nothing a little time on the putting green won't fix.

"We know what we need to work," Knight said. "Now we can focus on putting — we need to get some confidence back in that area."

The Wildcats shot 934 as a team, finishing 16th out of 18 teams at Highlands Ranch Golf Course in Highlands Ranch, Colo. Kali Quick led the Wildcats with a score of 230 in three rounds, including a one-over par 73 in her final round Tuesday. Quick's performance left her tied for 36th in the field.

Hailey Mireles shot a final score of 234, Michelle Regan and Abbi Sunner shot 235, and Krista Nelson shot 243.

The Wildcats' performance followed a second-place finish last week at the Chip-N-Club Invitational, in which three members finished in the top 10.

The Wildcats might not have putted well, Knight said, but at least they were consistent.

"We putted consistently poorly," Knight said. "I don't think we were

Team faces toughest Big 12 test against OU

By Joel Jellison
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State volleyball team is off to a 10-2 start and ranked 16th in the country, but coach Suzie Fritz said the road is about to get tougher.

When Oklahoma visits Ahearn Field House at 7 tonight, Fritz said the Wildcats will face their stiffest competition yet in Big 12 Conference play.

"This will be the best Big 12 opponent that we've faced thus far," Fritz said. "I feel like we are starting to grow and improve as a team, and we continue to get better."

The match will feature two of the four Big 12 teams with perfect conference records, giving the match early-season implications for the championship race.

Oklahoma brings a different look than the past two Big 12 opponents that fell victim to the Wildcats' five-match winning streak. Fritz said the Sooners play a quicker style of volleyball, which has helped them to a 9-2 record.

The Sooners' fast style of play, which helped them sweep the season series against K-State a year ago, is a product of head coach Santiago Restrepo, Fritz said.

"They are always a good team — they have been since Santiago took them over," Fritz said. "They play very fast which can cause you some problems."

Oklahoma comes into the match having won its last two matches over KU and then-No. 25 Texas A&M.

K-State is coming off its fifth-straight sweep, a 3-0 win over Baylor on Saturday.

K-State moves up 3 spots to No. 16 in AVCA Top 25

STAFF REPORT

The K-State volleyball squad moved up three spots in the latest American Volleyball Coaches Association Top 25 Poll, coming in at No. 16.

The Wildcats received 573 points after opening Big 12 Conference play with back-to-back sweeps of Kansas and Baylor.

Nebraska remained unbeaten and claimed the top spot in the poll once again.

Texas A&M dropped out of the poll after losing to Oklahoma.

Punter named to Ray Guy watch list

Senior punter Tim Reyer was one of five players in the Big 12 Conference and 41 players nationally named to the Ray Guy Award watch list.

The former walk-on leads the Big 12 in total punting with a 44.6-yard average, a mark that ranks 15th nationally.

He has downed six of his 14 punts inside the 20-yard line.

Prosecutors rarely try rape cases

Editor,

To clarify certain items in Scott Girard's article "Profile describes Manhattan serial rapist," Monday:

The "rape problem" in Manhattan is actually a national problem and the same here as on other campuses — high percentages of women experiencing assault; hesitation in reporting due to fear of not being believed, fear of retaliation, fear of being blamed.

FBI, Department of Justice and other studies suggest that only 15-30 percent of rapes are reported. One reason women do not report is lack of results. Prosecutors want to try cases that have a chance of resulting in conviction. Many women have been told by police or others "it will be your word against his — don't bother." In fact, a jury in Kansas has discretion to convict based simply on hearing both sides of the story.

I do not characterize "campus rapists" as "power assertive rapists." As I told Girard, typologies are too simplistic, and since method of resistance can be based on such characterizations, it is important not to throw these labels around lightly.

We know that one out of four college women, between the ages of 13 and graduation, will be victimized by rape or sexual assault. Obviously, we need to talk about ways to increase the prosecution of this crime.

But stats are only part of the story. A primary reaction reported by victims of the serial rapist and of acquaintance rapists is the pain and dread of having to tell mom and dad. Academics suffer. Prophylactic drugs against disease have to be taken. Sometimes boyfriends leave.

Confidence is shattered. Trust is ruined. Friendships change. Counseling can help an individual move through the natural trauma of being violated, but this takes time. Why should 25 percent of your female friends — and a smaller percentage of males as well — have to endure this?

How have we grown to accept half a million rapes a year in this country? The media focus on the serial rapist for sensational reasons. What about the serial rapists who are targeting K-State students every week? Men, demand that your living groups get informed about legal consent rules and what being convicted of a felony can mean. If you know someone who drugs or bullies and forces behavior on others, call them on it. Step up.

DIRECTOR OF THE WOMEN'S CENTER

Readers should respect free speech, not expect to agree with everything

Editor,

I would like to issue a response to the column, "Students, faculty protest Collegian column at Alumni Center," and all Hispanics/Mexican Americans who feel they were slighted by the column.

It is increasingly obvious to me in this country that no person is assured his or her constitutional right to free speech. I want to first say I in no way agree with the column; however, that is the view of whoever wrote it and their right.

The fact the Hispanic community took such offense to an article as unfounded and ridiculous as this one speaks volumes about where we are as a country.

An ethnic group supposedly as socially and economically hindered and disenfranchised as the Hispanics now has to turn to such nonsensical columns to find argument.

There are innumerable student organizations benefiting Hispanics. For example, the Hispanic American Leadership Organization, Alianza — the organization that led the protests, and many others.

K-State even recognizes a Hispanic Event Month in honor of the culture. It is my belief it's not the Hispanics who should be protesting an unfounded column, but those students who don't have a cultural day, who don't get scholarships for being a minority and who don't have a group dedicated to celebrating their culture.

Such a group would not be in the interest of either the university or the university's driving focuses: diversity and "tolerance." Those students are at a real financial disadvantage. It is those students who are afraid to challenge anything having to do with race for fear of being labeled a "racist" or "bigot" who should take offense at the protests.

We are sacrificing the freedoms of many in this country for the consolation of a few. To say that a column written for whatever reason "almost comes as a threat" is in and of itself terrifying. Someone who is intolerant of another human being's opinion is the greatest threat to this country.

JUNIOR IN MILLING SCIENCE AND MANAGEMENT

People should open wallets to donate

Editor,

The 2007 K-State United Way fund drive for faculty and staff begins Oct. 1. This effort is in support of the United Way of Riley County that raises funds to help support the work of 15 local human-service organizations.

Last year, these agencies provided assistance to one in three Riley County residents. That's 29,000 of us.

These agencies touch every age, from infant to retiree, and continue to make Riley County a great place to live, work, do business and retire.

They can't do it alone.

They need you and me. Please give the information found in the UW employee packets your caring consideration.

Don't just throw your campaign packet in the trash or stick it in the campus mail box unopened. Open it up, check out in the information provided and then decide whether you want to be part of solutions that will help make our community an even better place to live.

Some thoughts for your consideration:

— 99 percent of every dollar raised in Riley County stays here. UW agencies spend less than 12 percent on administration — far less than the 25 percent recommended by the Better Business Bureau.

— More than 100 homeless individuals had to be turned away during the first six months of 2007 due to lack of space and funding at the Manhattan Emergency Shelter.

— The equivalent of six classrooms full of children were helped by the local Sunflower CASA, but that's only 66 percent of the abused and neglected kids who need this service.

More funding and volunteers are necessary to meet the needs.

— The Crisis Center provided long-term shelter and counseling to more than 1,500 victims of domestic violence during 2006 with the 2007 needs already above that level.

— If everyone gives a quarter a day more than they did last year, the funds raised will allow our local human-service agencies to do what they do best — provide excellent care to those in our community who need help the most.

Please join me in giving to the United Way.

K-STATE STUDENT UNION
KSU UNITED WAY COMMITTEE CO-CHAIR

Editor,

The students and faculty who protested at the Alumni Center on Friday are out of line. The article Brecheisen wrote was not about immigrants in general, but illegal immigrants.

No part of the article said anything that was discriminatory against legal immigrants.

The whole point of her article — the dangers we face when illegal immigrants are not medically tested — was completely ignored.

The comments Rebecca Paz made about censoring the material in the paper is absolutely ridiculous. This article was in the Opinion section, and that is exactly what this was.

The beauty of an opinion column is people with different views on controversial issues can express their opinions for others to consider.

If only articles everyone agreed on were posted, there would be no point in an opinion column.

Opinion writers like Kevin Phillips write articles that constantly bash Christians, which I strongly do not agree with, but I am not going to have a demonstration against it because he has the right to express his opinions just as I do.

This idea of censorship is a terrible "Big Brother" approach of controlling what students read. More importantly, the reason this column shouldn't be censored is because it is discussing illegal matters.

Since when did it become a crime for a person to express they do not support illegal activities in this country? Since the article was written about illegal immigrants, the only people who should be offended by it are illegal immigrants and people who support their illegal activities.

The comments made by Clemente Jaquez-Herrera were far more discriminatory than anything in Brecheisen's article. Herrera inferred the average person takes the time to think about his citizenship, assume he is illegal and decide he should not be in this country — while simply passing him on the street.

I hope the average person who read his comments is not offended by his opinion. People need to realize not everyone is going to agree on every issue. We are guaranteed the freedom of speech, not the freedom of speech when it doesn't hurt someone else's feelings. My advice to the protesters: get over it.

HIGH-TECH BATTLE

Apple computers steal programs from Microsoft, offer few options

Growing up with personal computers nearly all my life, I find it hard to make the move to Macintosh computers, which are growing in popularity.

The Apple system is much more complicated than the PC I love and am accustomed to. However, being a journalism major does not help my case. Macintosh computers are the machine to use as a journalist, but I am not quite sure I understand the reason behind this.

Sure, I would like to fit in with the majority of journalism majors and give into the $1,200 laptop that does not quite seem to be any better than my $850 laptop.

So that is one aspect in the case against Macs: the price.

The second aspect of my argument is the fact that there is a lack of a default right-click option. Yes, it might be a minor aspect, but I find it to be annoying.

On laptops and older desktop computers, the default mouse does not provide a right click. Somehow when I need to right click, it will not work, and I cannot figure it out. However, when I do not need to right-click, I click something and the options that come with the right click options appear, and I never can get out of it.

This is just one instance displaying how confusing the operating system on a Mac is with all the applications. The Windows system? Very simple to learn.

With Windows' system is Microsoft's Internet Explorer, an Internet browser. The Internet browser is free from the Microsoft Web site. After Microsoft decided to develop this browser, Apple came up with its own browser, Safari. Please keep in mind the key words here: after Microsoft. Apple is really not original at all.

PCs are also more convenient because they simply have more options. There are numerous companies that produce PCs with Windows, including Dell, Hewlett Packard, Sony, Toshiba and Compaq. Each company has its own line of computers – desktops and laptops – with a large variety of options.

With each company line, there are many options to choose from. There are base models for those consumers who do not need a lot of extras. Then there are the computers loaded with all the specifications for those looking for more from their machine.

Dell offers the XPS line, which includes the latest technology and High-Definition Widescreen for all models.

Since all PC companies offer these base and high-end models, that means there are plenty of models to choose from that fit any person's needs. Thus, please take note of Apple's options: only two laptops and three desktop computers to choose from. Way to provide options for customers, Apple.

Also, how about those Microsoft applications like Microsoft Word and Excel on Mac? This proves that Microsoft's programs, found on PCs, are better than Mac programs. Text Edit? It is like a WordPad program found on a PC; that's Apple's best shot at a word-processing program? Get your own programs, Apple.

Then people try to tell me Macs are better than PCs. If you are using PC programs, you might as well have a PC.

To continue on that point, finding programs and accessories that are compatible for Macs is difficult. Some of these products can be found online and in computer stores, but only a limited selection is provided. To find such programs compatible with the Mac, one most likely will have to go into an Apple store or somewhere that specializes in Macintoshes. What does this mean? Higher prices.

While the Mac computers have a nice design, they are not anything more spectacular than any PC. A few minor features are cool, but I will stick with my PC over a Mac. My PC gets the job done just fine.

I find that learning an entire new system will be a waste of my time with little reward. Apple needs to stick to the iPhone and iPod. That is what Apple is good at – not computers.

Maybe I am the odd one out among the journalism majors, but oh well.

Ashley Frey is a sophomore in mass communications. Please send comments to edge@spub.ksu.edu.

Mac systems provide integrated software, protection from spyware

It's a rehearsed, decade-old debate, but one that boils down to one main point: Macintosh computers are superior to personal computers in nearly every way.

Most people's initial complaint against Macs is they are too hard to use. PC users in particular have this gripe, but in reality, Macs don't operate that differently.

The main differences are minor at best. The minimize buttons are in opposite corners, Mac laptops have no right-click button (feel free to plug in a mouse to solve this problem if the combination of pressing buttons and clicking instead of a click bothers you), and Macs use a different Internet application than Internet Explorer. That's pretty much it.

I was a PC user my whole life until I bought my first Mac a year ago. I'm no computer whiz, but I managed to become reasonably comfortable with the oh-so-foreign Mac in about a week.

Pretty much everyone and their mom has an iPod and therefore uses iTunes. If you can use iTunes and navigate through your library, playlists and search capabilities, you already know how to use at least half of Mac applications. They're all similarly designed – another reason Macs are better than PCs.

If, however, you're truly a PC-application stickler, Mac can take care of that, too. Apple offers a program for Macs called Boot Camp. This software is free and reasonably easy to load.

Essentially, it allows Macs to operate with Windows functions. As you start up your computer you choose whether to run it with Windows, or with the Mac OS X application. The only catch to this is you do have to buy Windows if you want to use it with your Mac, which can be kind of pricey. Windows XP software costs around $200 (half the price of an average PC itself), but by eliminating your dependence on Windows, you eliminate paying higher costs.

As far as Mac setup goes, it's probably the simplest computer process I've ever gone through.

When I first got my Mac and took it out of the packaging, I had no idea what to do. I just sort of stared at it for a minute before pressing the power button. I was then prompted to enter in some registration details, and after about 15 minutes I was good to go.

A huge concern for both Mac and PC users is spyware. It seems impossible to escape, and I've had more than one computer ruined because they became overloaded with spyware. This has never been a concern with my Mac.

My Internet doesn't suddenly shut down for no reason, I don't have eight million pop-ups, and my Mac doesn't run noticeably slower after a few weeks. Mac OS X, the operating system that comes with Mac computers, is designed for high security, and you can tell. It's awesome.

In addition to Mac's user-friendly nature and incredible spyware protection, it also has phenomenal programs. Every Mac comes pre-loaded with iLife, a program that houses a variety of applications. These applications encompass everything from iPhoto (similar to Adobe Photoshop, but better, and with the ability to accommodate and group all your photos in addition to editing them) to iTunes and even iDVD.

The best part of iLife? All of the applications work together. Sure, you could go and buy programs similar to all these for a PC, but they wouldn't work together as well.

For instance, with iLife, you can take photos from iPhoto and songs from iTunes and incorporate them into a movie you're making in iDVD. Apple likes to call this goody-bag of applications "seamless integration," and I believe it.

Since a Mac basically has everything you'd ever need on the inside, it's no surprise the outside is just as great. Macs are incredibly stylish and designed in a useful, minimalist way.

A base model Mac laptop is going to be thinner and lighter than an average PC laptop (unless, of course you get a Mac laptop with a bigger screen for example). Macs have a sleek, elegant look to them. And hey, let's face it, they just look more attractive than your average run-of-the-mill PC. Good-looking people deserve good-looking computers.

Bottom line: Macs are more useful and attractive than PCs. Thousands of people have made the switch, and for good reason.

Sunset Zoo to build $3.5M educational facility to better serve community

By Amanda Keim
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Usually grade-school students do not see anything bigger than a hamster in their classrooms, but classes at Sunset Zoo, they might see a red panda.

Sunset Zoological Park, with the Department of Parks and Recreation and the Department of Public Works, is in the process of planning an expansion and remodeling of several zoo facilities, including the Asian Forest Trail and proposed education building.

"It's kind of neat to see all of these departments come together (for this project)," said Ally Lousch, marketing and development officer at Sunset Zoo. "We're getting a lot of help from our city family. It is being done in the most efficient manner because most of the work is in house or in the city."

The remodeling of the Asian Forest Trail will slightly alter guests' viewing ability of a few exhibits including the red panda, the otter and the grizzly bear exhibit, she said.

"The Asian Forest Trail is one of the most historical areas in the zoo," Lousch said. "It's just so impressive to see what these people did with their hands. They created this beautiful exhibit, and it's still pretty sound."

Though parts of the exhibit remain intact, Lousch said a hill on one side makes the exhibit unstable in its entirety. The trail was built during the New Deal Era with the use of one mule and 60 men, Lousch said.

"These people were very forward-thinking," she said. "We're upgrading because this area is part of our otter holding, and we're going to be picking up another one here pretty soon and then two more from Quebec."

Once the zoo receives the otters, it plans to rotate them through the exhibit, having two on display at a time, she said.

Some of the educational programs the Sunset Zoological Park offers the community use animals, like this ferret, as part of the teaching process. The Sunset Zoo is planning an expansion and remodeling of several zoo facilities, including building an educational facility that will cost an estimated $3.5 million.

Joslyn Brown
COLLEGIAN

This rotation process is expected to improve the otters' activities and provide for greater guest involvement in the exhibit.

Improvements also will be made on the holding area for the zoo's red panda. These improvements are designed to create a better environment for both guests and animals.

"It's great for the animals," Lousch said. "People love happy, healthy animals, and that's one thing we have."

While maintaining a beneficial environment for both the animals and patrons, Sunset Zoo also will improve its educational facilities for families and children. In the proposed educational building, the zoo has incorporated an indoor rotunda, a new entry with interactive exhibits and a gift shop, an outdoor educational animal exercise arena, and a set of new age-appropriate classrooms for grades preschool through grade 12, Lousch said.

"One of the most amazing things about the zoo is that our education program brings in almost as many people as our zoo does through the gates — and there are after-school programs," Lousch said. "My job is just to invite people to visit this environment. We're part of the top-10 zoos in the nation. We're like the bigger zoos, only smaller."

"It says something that we have several animals that have far outlived their zoo expectancy. There are some really neat animals here."

By creating an educational building, the zoo hopes to serve more guests at once and to expand their programs. In recent summers, the buildings have been filled by clubs, and the zoo has been forced to turn away guests who wish to schedule birthdays or other events, said Becky Clark, education assistant at Sunset Zoo.

"It will allow us to expand our number of programs and with the classrooms we will be able to work with local schools more and open up learning processes at the zoo," Clark said.

The zoo is working to raise approximately $1 million of an estimated $3.5 million in total costs toward the educational facility construction, said Tom Phillips, Manhattan mayor.

"I think those (educational programs) are wonderful assets that the zoo provides to not only our own community but also to the people in our region," Phillips said. "From what I understand, the zoo has reached their capacity in the program."

As the zoo takes on projects to better present itself, Lousch said she hopes to maintain city residents' support, as well as that of the K-State students who volunteer with the animals.

"Instead of seeing this out-of-date ticket booth, you're going to see this huge center," Clark said. "It's going to allow us to be more efficient and it's going to allow us to be more centralized. It's going to be amazing."

Future additions to K-State Online to make instructor-student communication easier

By Brandon McAtee

Students now have more ways to communicate with their instructors, and they can do it while sitting at home in front of their computers.

K-State Online offers a number of tools for students and instructors, but the most interactive ones are the message board and chat room.

Rob Caffey, director of mediated education, said the use of the features varies for instructors and courses.

"The courses on campus will frequently use them for students to engage with each other, and teachers for topics in the classroom," he said. "Distance components will use the board as a primary means for information. And there are other instructors that do not use them at all."

The instructors that do use the message boards share information like notes and test dates with their students. John Fliter, professor of political science, has been using the K-State Online features for five years. He uses the message boards to post important topics and current events for discussion.

Though Fliter continuously uses K-State Online, he thinks the popularity of the message board is diminishing.

"There may be some burn-outs on the message boards," he said. "A few years ago it was new and everyone was using it. I think you see a bit of a drop-off in participation in the past year or two. Some students just might not want to do anything out of class."

He said another reason students do not use the message board is if it is not required.

While Fliter's students can actively use the features for his classes, other students have instructors that do not utilize the option.

Michael Apel, junior in pre-journalism and mass communications, said he tried to use a class message board but noticed it was outdated.

"There was a post from somebody looking for notes, but the post was from two years ago," he said. "So, I do not think that this is the best way for students to interact."

Caffey said another available interactive tool is the chat function, which is one of the oldest tools on K-State Online.

"It is used for real-time communication," he said.

He said chat rooms are used heavily in some classes, yet there is less use in recent years because of the development of new features.

Fliter said he uses the chat room tool as a study session before exams.

"Students can ask questions and I will answer the night before," he said. "The nice thing about that is if a student cannot make it, I can archive it and the entire chat session is there online, which is an advantage to the on-campus review."

Fliter said he likes the features because they make it easier for him to expand on subjects that are not covered completely in class.

"It is also easier for some students who are afraid to speak out in a classroom setting to speak out," he said.

Caffey said interaction on K-State Online might increase with some additions in the next release in August 2008.

He said Wimba might be an addition. Wimba is described as a "live virtual classroom environment for real-time interaction between students and teachers."

Wimba also includes multi-way real-time voice chat, versus the current text-based chat that K-State Online offers, he said.

Other changes might include making the message board look more like a Web-based forum and including user profile pictures with the posts.

surprise," Norris said. "He's a player that has a bright future not only at Kansas State but also has a desire to play professionally after college. He has the talent, tools and dedication."

Senior Kyle Yonke carded the best round of the day for the Wildcats, shooting 75 for a three-round total of 227. Spencer Alefs, Joe Ida and Mitchell Gregson shot four-over par, while junior Robert Streb turned in a six-over par 78 in the final round.

"We had a lot of wasted shots, and to win, you have to play excellent golf," Norris said. "All we needed was a couple low rounds, but we didn't have anyone overachieve."

K-State finished 10 strokes behind first-place Houston and four strokes behind Oral Roberts and Kansas.

"We were only 10 strokes from winning, and I'm pretty sure we could find 10 shots we left on the course pretty easily," Norris said. "We mainly just need to try and make all of our putts from 10 feet and in."

In the Wildcats' next tournament they will play host to 10 schools in the Jim Colbert Intercollegiate Sept. 24-25, in Manhattan.

inconsistent at this event. We never got comfortable on the greens, and we were missing way too many putts. When you get on the green and three-putt, that can wear on you after a while."

The next tournament for the Wildcats will be the Marilyn Smith/Sunflower Invitational Oct. 1-2 at Colbert Hills.

"I have no doubt that they will bounce back strong because they don't like being where they are on the scoreboard after this event," Knight said.

a game plan about as well as we had all year," Fritz said. "I thought the girls seemed to be on target with the things we were concerned about with Baylor."

The Wildcats' match with Oklahoma will be televised live tonight by FSN Midwest and will be broadcast on 1350

KMAN.

The Barn Party promotion, with prizes awarded to fans with the best farmyard costumes, also will take place tonight.

K-State Obama supporters to be on TV

By Emily Sterk
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The C-SPAN Campaign 2008 tour bus will be on campus Sept. 27, from noon to 4 to speak with two student-run political groups, like Students for Obama and Young Democrats.

There are 109 members in Students for Obama, which was created at the beginning of August.

Jeanette Rikli, chapter coordinator, said she was contacted by the Obama's campaign headquarters to help start the first campaign group at K-State. She said the group's goal is for 20 percent of K-State students to pledge their vote to Obama for the 2008 election.

"We are a relaxed group of individuals that are actively seeking new members," Rikli said. "We would really like anyone who thinks they could contribute to the campaign."

Rikli said the reason the group is so appealing and why C-SPAN has taken an interest in it is because the members are not biased toward any political issues.

"What sets us apart is that we believe Obama can truly change America," Rikli said.

Tiffany Cooper, student coordinator for Students for Obama, said C-SPAN is visiting universities that have political groups supporting specific candidates. Cooper, junior in anthropology and biology, said C-SPAN chose to come to K-State because the group supports the democratic party even though Kansas is a conservative state.

"Kansas is stereotyped as a conservative state," she said. "It would be good for Kansas — and Obama — to show that we (in Kansas) are diverse."

Aaron Apel, president of Young Democrats and supporter of Students for Obama, said this presidential election, compared to the 2004 election, is more intriguing because a woman and a black man are running for the same party.

"Kansas has been a red state," said Apel, senior in philosophy and political science. "They want to see where a very red state sits on this election. College students tend to lean more liberal. It is a great resource to get students to vote."

Bringing C-SPAN to K-State not only provides attention for the university but is a way to hear students' opinions.

"It is great exposure for K-State, that our opinions matter and are out there," Apel said.

He also said C-SPAN's visit is a way to reach out to regions that do not get a lot of input.

"It is good for students who are interested in politics and the Midwest who can get in on the excitement about the election," Apel said.

The Facebook.com group, "Kansas State University students for Barack Obama," is where students can go to get involved with the K-State chapter. According to the group's description, it is an official Students for Obama chapter, and there are hundreds of groups located around the nation.

"We're organizing students to register voters, get out the vote, raise funds and spread Barack Obama's message of hope, action (and) change," Rikli said in a post on The Facebook group.

Rikli said that on Wednesdays and Thursdays the group will have booths in the union. They also will tailgate at every home game.

Troupe adapts Beijing Opera for American audience

By Sarah Burford
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Americans probably would never understand China's Beijing Opera in its original form, but with a little adaptation, it's not as far-fetched as people might think.

"Kungfu Theatre: Tales from the Beijing Opera" was performed Wednesday night at McCain Auditorium. The show is a collection of plays adapted to appeal to American audiences and help them better understand the Chinese culture.

Merriane Moore, an actress who returned to the United States after studying for seven years at the Beijing Opera in China, created the acting troupe called Strangecandy in 2000, which performs Kungfu Theatre across the United States. She said she got the idea when she saw many Chinese actors in New York City who were looking for opportunities on the stage.

"Part of it was about integrating what I learned and experienced (in China) with my American culture," she said.

Moore said she wanted to perform the plays in both English and Chinese to make Beijing Opera more accessible to Americans. In each play, one of the two actors speaks English, and the other answers in Chinese. Though it might seem hard to follow two different languages, the acting is animated enough that the story line is easily understood.

"It's certainly based in Chinese theater, but we're not looking to be a museum," Moore said. "It's more for fun and entertainment."

The two plays performed at K-State were "Fighting in the Dark" and "Autumn River," both comedies.

Tai-Wen Ko, freshman in computer engineering, said he thought the performance was well done.

"It was interesting to see how they do part English and part Chinese," Ko said. "You really don't find this kind of thing a lot, especially in America."

"Fighting in the Dark" was about a warrior, played by actor — and Shandong native — Dong Xie, who spent the night at an inn and found himself battling the murderous innkeeper in the darkness of his room. Actor Hui Zhang, who originally came from a town near Shanghai, played the innkeeper.

The play began with the warrior, who showed off his graceful skills with exact, deliberate flicks of his ankles and arms, accompanied by an occasional twirl that sometimes resembled break-dancing.

Moore said this exact style is typical of Chinese theater. The warrior wore a sky-blue robe, intricately embroidered with red and yellow flowers, and had his sword tucked behind his back.

The innkeeper entered the stage dressed in silky black and painted with a cat-like face. His light-footed flips foreshadowed the sneaky character he would reveal later in the story. The innkeeper conversed in English and the warrior in Chinese, while they both sized each other up with shifty eyes.

The warrior was shown to his room where he pretended to turn off the lights and climb in bed. Little did he know, the innkeeper was returning to attack him. The rest of the play was full of evasions and close calls as the warrior's and innkeeper's swords clashed in the imagined darkness. The actors came practically nose to nose, and yet still pretended not to see each other in the warrior's room. They flipped and dived to avoid each other's swords once they discovered where the other was.

"Autumn River" featured a woman, played by Moore, who fell in love with a nun's nephew, but was heartbroken when the nun grew jealous and sent her nephew away. The woman's only choice was to pay her uncle, a fisherman, to take her by boat to her lover.

The woman glided onto the stage dressed in a diamond-patterned robe, complete with a pair of red, pom-pommed shoes and a tall, black hat studded with jewels. She spoke English in a shrill, nasal voice, mixing her American accent with Chinese tones. After the woman discovered her lover was gone, her fisherman uncle took her to him. They bobbed up and down on the stage, imitating a rocking boat, and eventually floated off behind the curtain.

Jianling Yue, Chinese instructor in the Department of Modern Languages, is from Beijing. She said the Beijing Opera is special because it is an old traditional art that represents the most standard opera in China. She said she liked hearing the performance partially translated into English.

"It's like your 'Hamlet' or 'Romeo and Juliet,'" she said. "Imagine if the actors all of a sudden spoke fluent Chinese."

Jie Lee, freshman in psychology, said he had never seen a Chinese theater performance before.

"I can't really put words to it," Lee said. "I thought it was beautiful."

K-State career fair brings more than 325 employers to meet students

By Andy Heintz
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The All-University Career Fair was host to a record number of companies this week.

More than 325 employers attended the career fair, which took place from 11 a.m. to 4 p.m. Wednesday at Bramlage Coliseum, and the fair continues today from 11 a.m. to 4 p.m.

In 1999, 301 employers were represented at the career fair, according to a Sept. 12 Media Relations and Marketing press release.

Jamshid Ebadi, manager at MarketSphere, said his company concentrates on targeting college communities, and K-State is one of the primary universities where they look for employees.

Ebadi said the students who want to make a good impression on companies should do research before contacting them.

"Be prepared and knowledgeable about the company you are dealing with and be confident," Ebadi said.

Makensie Provorse, junior in chemistry, also said being prepared is a good way to make a strong first impression.

"You have to dress to impress and know what you are talking about," Provorse said. "You should make sure to have prepared questions to ask employers."

Debbie Swanson, ME Group principal, said students with experience do have an advantage over other students looking for a job with her company.

"Having internships makes students more marketable to a company," Swanson said.

Career and Employment Services sponsors the career fair each year. CES helps students prepare for meetings with possible employers by allowing students to make appointments with area directors where they can get help to develop a résumé and search for a job.

Kyle Kohman, senior in mechanical engineering, said CES helped him prepare for meeting with employers.

"They made me cut my résumé down from two pages to one," Kohman said. "They told me what employers are looking for and what they don't really care about."

CES Director Kerri Day Keller said students who missed the career fair can attend the Graduate/Professional School Fair on Oct. 24 and the Fall Education Career Fair on Nov. 2. "There are still many opportunities for students to get connected with employers," Keller said.

Journalism agency director to give Huck Boyd Lecture

Adrianne DeWeese
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The executive director of a watchdog investigative journalism organization will speak at 10:30 a.m. today in Forum Hall.

Buzenberg

Bill Buzenberg, executive director of the Center for Public Integrity, will present the eighth-annual Huck Boyd Lecture in Community Media. Buzenberg will discuss independent media and the importance of getting information from diverse news sources, said Gloria Freeland, Huck Boyd National Center for Community Media director.

It is important for journalists and news consumers alike to read as many news sources as possible to understand today's world, said Freeland, assistant professor of journalism and mass communications.

"I think everyone needs to realize how important it is to have independent media," she said.

Buzenberg, a K-State graduate, has served as a correspondent, editor and news executive at newspapers and public radio for more than 35 years. He served as vice president of news and information at National Public Radio from 1990-97 and started "Speaking of Faith," a radio program on religion.

"Religion and the Media," a panel discussion with the representatives of six religions, will occur from 1:30-3:30 p.m. today in Union 212. Panel members will offer suggestions for how media can improve upon media coverage, Freeland said.

Bill Tammeus, faith columnist for the Kansas City Star, will moderate the discussion, and Buzenberg also will attend the discussion. Religions that will be represented include Islam, Judaism, Protestantism, Catholicism, Buddhism and Hinduism.

Angela Powers, Miller School director, said it is important for students to hear about professions like journalism first hand. It also is important for students to ask Buzenberg and the panelists questions.

"Religion in the media is a hot topic today because of the wars being fought around the world," Powers said. "Participation at these events also brings out interesting topics. Go for the speech, but also go to ask in-depth questions."

David Jones, campus pastor for CrossRoads of Ecumenical Campus Ministry, will serve on the religion panel. Regardless of academic majors or professions, Jones said religion affects everyone.

"I think it's important for all students as educated citizens to have a good grasp of what religion is and how it impacts civil society," he said. "Religion affects all human existence at one level or another."

The Huck Boyd National Center for Community Media serves and strengthens local newspapers, radio stations, cable systems and other media. The center, which is located in K-State's A.Q. Miller School of Journalism and Mass Communications, was founded in 1990.

McDill "Huck" Boyd was a politician, journalist and entrepreneur who served as editor of The Phillips County Review. He ran for Kansas governor twice and represented Kansas on the Republican National Committee for 20 years. Boyd died in 1987 at age 79.

Freeland also said students should attend Buzenberg's lecture and the panel discussion to learn about diverse viewpoints.

"More people are paying attention to religion since Sept. 11," she said. "It's important to have a better understanding and an overall big picture of religion."

Minimum-wage increase on campus requires SGA to allocate more funds to Union, Lafene, athletics

Scott Girard
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Some on-campus agencies might need a raise because of the minimum wage increase.

Clint Blaes said the K-State Student Union, athletic department and the Lafene Health Center requested money for the increase in student minimum wages from $6 to $6.50.

Blaes, senior in agricultural journalism, said the Student Governing Association sent a letter to all the agencies covered by privilege fees in June when the university made the announcement to raise minimum wage, which began Aug. 12 this year.

The Athletic Department and the Lafene Health Center requested more than $6,000 while the Union requested close to $20,000 to make up for the increased wages.

Blaes said the SGA allocations committee only recommended $10,000 to the Union, while leaving the other requests the same. Student Senate will vote on the emergency allocations tonight.

He said the Union requested enough money for all employees in the minimum-wage pay scale to receive a 50-cent pay increase, instead of just increasing the salaries of employees receiving less than the $6.50 wage.

Jack Thoman, Union business manager, said the Union employs approximately 80 students near the minimum-wage pay scale. Thoman said these employees account for close to 40,000 hours of work per year, making the 50-cent increase an unexpected $20,000 expense.

Blaes said the Union only would need about $9,000 to raise the wages of students on minimum wages. He said the recommended $10,000 was a compromise.

The last time the university raised minimum wages, Thoman said the university administration paid for the Union's emergency costs. Blaes said SGA did not consider this option.

"We tried to handle it through privilege fees because that's where agencies get their money from," Blaes said.

Those three agencies are not the only places on campus that employ students at close to minimum wages. Blaes said those places did not need money because they had extra reserves, including the Peters Recreation Complex.

Blaes said the money for the emergency allocations will come from the overall privilege-fee reserve. Blaes said not all the money taken from student privilege-fees is allocated, so the leftover money is placed in the reserve fund.

He said the reserve had more than $820,000 before the allocations.

He said the agencies did not have enough money because the wage raise was not taken into account when the privilege-fee allocations were last reviewed. He said SGA might have to increase allocations, especially if K-State raises the minimum wage in the future.

"As we review the budgets, we'll make sure the agencies take that into account," he said.

Thoman said the Union will need money to keep attracting students and paying them a reasonable salary.

"It's good to have some continuity so we can continue to attract students to work here on campus," he said.

Jumping the gun France should seek diplomacy before invading Iran

In the American Revolution, the newborn United States racked up almost $11 million in foreign debt. The majority of the debt was owed to France. In fact, throughout the American Revolution, the French sent commanders to help train militia, weapons when they didn't have money and a naval fleet to help end the war.

KEVIN PHILLIPS

Fast forward to 2007 and the old hardline, helpful France, is back. According to a Sept. 17 CNN report, France's Foreign Minister declared if Iran obtains nuclear weapons, the world should prepare to go to war. These threats have sparked a debate among the world about the right action to take.

French Foreign Minister Bernard Kouchner is calling for sanctions, even going as far as to say they will do it with or without UN support. This is rather bold — yet not surprising — language.

National Public Radio on Aug. 23 reported Iran publicly has called for the extermination of Israel on numerous occasions. These announcements are homicidal enough, but the story gets even scarier when Iran's nuclear capability is factored in.

They recently announced enriched uranium fuel is ready to be shipped from Russia to Iran's first nuclear power plant. Iran already has the ability to begin enriching small amounts of uranium.

France, Germany, and of course, Israel all are starting to prepare for a war in Iran. Defense Secretary Robert Gates reports the Bush administration stands firmly resolved to use diplomatic solutions.

It's good to see they have learned they can't just invade first and ask questions later.

It appears as though the world's Middle East policy has come full circle. France is calling for tough sanctions and war; the United States wants diplomatic solutions.

It is even more interesting when you factor in our current societal hatred toward the French. We have even gone so far as to truly slap them in the face by removing their name from fried potatoes.

While the United States might have been wrong to chastise them about not invading Iraq, it might be extremely beneficial for the United States to chastise France about its recent remarks.

The International Herald Tribune on Aug. 31 called France's remarks weak and irrational. France might have alluded to war, but part of the sanctions they called for were not exactly steps that lead to war. Moreover, the remarks are not anything new to Iran.

Iran has been branded as part of the "axis of evil," and has been threatened in about every way possible.

France would have an enormous amount of trouble invading Iran without the help of the global community, and right now war doesn't reflect U.S. policy toward Iran.

Will Iran stop its nuclear program? Probably not. Despite the sanctions, negotiations and threats, war still might be on the horizon. But in this moment, this time, it seems we owe everyone just a little more time to try diplomatic solutions before doing what no one wants to do: invade.

TO THE POINT

People learn from others' viewpoints

Students and faculty have the opportunity to hear the diverse viewpoints of six different religions during a panel discussion this afternoon.

TO THE POINT is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

While the panel discussion is geared toward media representatives and how well they report on religion, students from different academic colleges and departments across campus can attend.

During a two-hour dialogue, they have the opportunity to learn about the Islam, Jewish, Protestant, Buddhist, Hindu and Catholic faiths.

We are all consumers of news in one form. Attending the panel discussion would allow news consumers and journalists alike to hear how religion coverage affects us and our viewpoints.

Sometimes the media paints a picture of religions at their extremes. In a post-Sept. 11 world, it is important for citizens to educate themselves on diversity and religion.

Learning about different faiths first-hand offers audience members the chance to decipher what they already have learned and heard in the media.

As the 19th-annual Community Cultural Harmony Week nears its end, students and faculty should take two hours out of the day to attend an educational dialogue.

Open-dialogue discussions often are one of the best ways to learn and foster, especially in a diverse environment like a college campus.

Sometimes the best way to learn about oneself comes from learning about others. The religion in the media panel today offers six opportunities for people to look at others — and themselves — differently.

Supporting troops should be U.S. citizens' top priority

Of all the controversial issues today, few would disagree that the war in Iraq is at the top of the list. Whether you're a supporter or a protester, it's a topic bound to seep its way into your daily life.

On Saturday, thousands of anti-war demonstrators waved their signs and shouted cleverly thought-out phrases in front of the Capitol.

According to MSNBC, the rally was organized by the A.N.S.W.E.R. Coalition — among other groups — and claimed more than 100,000 people attended. Their Web site states their group stands for "Act Now to Stop War and End Racism," and they've been organizing demonstrations since September 2001.

The news report said 160 protesters were arrested after crossing barricades, and the protesters had the audacity to shout derogatory comments at the police who were protecting other innocent citizens.

This whole situation makes me want to pound my head onto a table. I have no real grudge against those who disagree with our government's actions in Iraq because the situation in Iraq hasn't been wonderful. However, we should recognize these protests only harm the morale of our troops overseas. Like it or not, we are there, and we're going to be there for a while. President Bush makes it clear he recognizes we're in a lot of hot water, but we have months ahead of us before we can start pulling troops back.

Preach about democracy and freedom of speech all you want, but if all the effort spent protesting our troops being overseas was redirected to letting them know, for better or worse, we appreciate what they're doing, we could make the situation far more positive.

The point is huge public protests like the one last Saturday create negative energy and make the soldiers question our loyalty.

We still have troops in Germany, Japan, and Korea; trying to impeach our president isn't going to get us any further in the effort to pull our soldiers out of Iraq.

For now, our best bet is to hold whatever opinion we wish but not let anything get in the way of support. We should be writing letters, sending care packages and doing whatever it takes to let the men and women far from home know they are at the top of our priorities.

That, in the end, is what can bind our country together — the notion we are a country of people who can set aside our opinions and support the sacrifice thousands are making for us daily.

United Way's Day of Caring promotes volunteering, giving back to Manhattan community

Amanda Keim
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Caring hearts and helpful hands rallied together Wednesday in conjunction with the United Way's 13th annual Riley County Day of Caring. The event, lasting from 8 a.m. to noon, gathered members of the community and distributed them to nonprofit organizations in need of assistance.

Most of the event is coordinated in the late summer when United Way sends out forms to potential volunteers. This allows the United Way to ensure a sufficient number of volunteers attend the event and gives volunteers the chance to prepare accordingly for their project, said Maxine Coffey, executive director of United Way of Riley County.

Projects range from painting and yard work to sorting and organizing supplies.

This year, two volunteers organized games and books at the 4th Street Boys and Girls Club.

Joyce Glasscock, executive director of Boys and Girls Club, said the club has participated in the Riley County Day of Caring for as long as she has worked with the organization.

"We've had a variety of projects," Glasscock said. "We've had volunteers paint, sort through our storage area and obviously the types of projects they're doing today. This is a very highly utilized facility. There is a lot of activity and a lot of organizational needs."

Whitney Short, realtor of Christian and Associates Real Estate, and Kay Fechter, administrative assistant in animal sciences, both were assigned to assist the Boys and Girls Club.

"I really believe that when the community gives you so much that you should give back to that," Short said. "I'm a member of the United Way, and I donate money, and I think it's silly to give money to something you don't understand."

By donating their time and effort, volunteers were rewarded with breakfast and an opportunity to see how donated funds are spent through the program.

"I just think that this is another important part of the United Way campaign that helps connect members of the community with agencies," Glasscock said.

Annie Pipes, Boys and Girls Club staff member, said the club serves an average of 17,000 kids, and each year the numbers increase.

"One of the things that people tell us when they've volunteered is that they really get a sense of what kind of need there is in the community," Coffey said. "We not only need financial support but there's also a great need for volunteering. People are usually very impressed with how quickly and efficiently these projects work."

As a popular candidate for receiving help from volunteers, the Boys and Girls Club is only one of 15 organizations in cooperation with United Way. Other organizations that received the aid of Riley County Day of Caring

Joslyn Brown | COLLEGIAN

As part of the United Way's Day of Service, Mollie Herbel and Lindsey Unruh, employees in the accounting department of DPRA, plant day lily bulbs outside of the Boys and Girls Club. Volunteers went to local charitable organizations to help with landscaping, cleaning and other assorted tasks from 8 a.m. to noon.

volunteers include Big Brothers/Big Sisters, the Manhattan Emergency Shelter, The Salvation Army and the Crisis Center Inc.

"Of course, their primary mission is to provide human services to their clientele, and that is always foremost," Coffey said. "This is a chance for those agencies to kind of showcase themselves to the community."

The Riley County Day of Caring is just one in a series of activities sponsored by the United Way to raise funds.

The United Way campaign began early with a pre-campaign fundraiser by local businesses and organizations that raised approximately $203,353 toward its $1 million goal. United Way volunteer fundraisers aim to have all donations accounted for by early November.

United Way of Riley

County plans to continue volunteer opportunities for local non-profit organizations and donate funds to help alleviate some of the burdens they face.

"It's like you go in with an idea of what you're going to do, but you come home realizing that you've gained," Short said. "It's almost overwhelming to realize the problems in the world, and it's important to make change."

Officials discuss city's population growth

By Andy Heintz
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

City officials discussed how to deal with Manhattan's expected population increase at a public meeting Wednesday.

The Flint Hills Regional Growth Plan held the meeting in City Hall.

Housing issues were the main topic, but transportation, childcare, mental health care, conservation and education also were discussed.

Manhattan's population is expected to grow because of an influx of soldiers at Fort Riley.

Riley, Geary and Pottawatomie counties are all expected to absorb part of this population growth. The planning team members said the best way to deal with this population change is to create a regional organization in which all effected parties could participate.

Affordable housing was the main concern discussed at the meeting.

The best way to get affordable housing is to do research to find out what kind of housing people want and can afford and then build accordingly, said Liz Drake, a planner with EDAW, an Atlanta-based consulting company.

Linda Morse, registrar for the K-State Division of Continuing Education said the main reason for attending the meeting was to find out where new houses in the region will be built.

"I am especially interested that we do not build residential homes near flood-prone regions," Morse said.

Drake recommended building houses in rural districts by building small lots and doing cluster housing. Drake said this would help the rural district to preserve land and prevent the erosion of rural character.

The number of military personnel was expected to have increased much more than it has, Drake said. Soldiers have not arrived as quickly as expected because of deployments to Iraq and Afghanistan.

However, Drake said, despite the late arrival, they eventually will settle in the region, so officials should plan ahead to prevent incompatible growth that could hurt the region.

Drake said she considered certain issues to be critical for preparing for growth in the region.

Karen Davis, Manhattan community development director, said she considers childcare a critical issue, because what Riley County has right now is not adequate to handle the expected population increase.

"Growth and potential loss of open spaces in rural areas, health care and childcare are a particular concern to me," she said.

Lower than 4th place in caucuses could end Brownback's campaign

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON — Anything less than a fourth-place finish in the Iowa caucuses could mean the end of Sen. Sam Brownback's presidential bid.

The Kansas Republican said Wednesday that finishing lower than fourth would make him reassess whether to keep his campaign going.

"It doesn't mean that I'll drop out, but I think it will be hard to continue from that point on forward," Brownback said in an interview. "We'll appraise it because you don't know what other dynamics are going to be in place at that time."

For Brownback to place fourth or higher, he would have to draw more votes than better-known GOP rivals John McCain, Rudy Giuliani, Fred Thompson and Mitt Romney.

"What we've got to do, I think, is finish fourth or better in the caucuses in Iowa, and I think we've got the organization in place to do that," Brownback said. "I think it's an attainable goal."

Brownback first made similar comments to the Des Moines Register.

Brownback has pinned his hopes on attracting support from evangelical Christians who are crucial to Republican politics in Iowa.

But he came in third place last month in an Iowa straw poll, finishing behind surprise runner-up Mike Huckabee, the former Arkansas governor, who is competing for the same bloc of conservative voters.

Romney, the former Massachusetts governor, easily won the straw poll.

The results gave new life to Huckabee's campaign, boosting his profile and expanding his pool of contributors.

Brownback says his third-place finish gave his campaign some momentum and helped him draw more media attention in the early primary states of New Hampshire and South Carolina.

Since then, Brownback has focused more on his foreign policy experience to distinguish himself from Romney and Huckabee.

Bye week offers rest to fans too

Everyone, let's sit back and take a deep breath. Go see an old friend. Or pay attention to that significant other you have put on the back burner during football season.

Stop checking for K-State statistics on every single sports Web site and just relax, because this is a week when the fans, as well as the players, need to rest.

This is bye week. Ron Prince probably won't be relaxing, even though his birthday was Tuesday. He has recruiting and the rest of the season on his mind. He, and the rest of his staff, will be working hard.

And that is the reason Wildcat fans should just chill and sip on the good things in life.

Prince understands the state of the football team exactly. He said he has assessed the team like it is already the end of the regular season and the Wildcats are heading into a bowl.

During the football press conference Monday, he broke down the offense, defense and special teams. He pointed out where the strengths and weaknesses have been for all three phases of the game.

He knows — we all know — that this team isn't perfect. They have a penalty problem, Josh Freeman can't seem to throw enough touchdowns to satisfy most people, and injuries are taking a toll on the defensive side of the ball.

Well, the bye week has the ability to cure these woes. Most injuries heal, and Prince is probably yelling at his players right now for the penalties. He also has said they purposefully have left some of the plays out of games in order to have some surprises left for Big 12 play. Hopefully, this will help Freeman and create more big plays from the passing offense.

When K-State steps into Darrell K. Royal Texas Memorial Stadium against the Texas Longhorns, it might look like the same team, but it will be reloaded with new bullets.

Texas will handle a lot of the twists K-State will have to throw at them, but they won't be able to handle others; this should keep the game close all day. This is probably one of the reasons ABC picked up the game for their 2:30 time slot.

All teams seemingly benefit from a week off. Last year, Kansas had an off week prior to playing K-State. They weren't as talented as the Wildcats, but they had time to scheme and heal their aching players. That is why they came out with a 39-20 victory over Prince's team.

So, this bye week comes at a perfect time for the Wildcats with Texas and Kansas on the horizon. Prince, who is handling his first bye week as a head coach, has everything under control. There will be healing. There will be new twists.

For the fans, there should be smiles and plenty of football watching.

Freshman Lauren Mathewson and the Wildcats had their consecutive-match win streak snapped with the five-game loss to Oklahoma on Wednesday evening at Ahearn Field House.

Team's win-streak ends despite out playing Oklahoma

By Jonathan Potter
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The 16th-ranked K-State volleyball team dominated the stat sheet Wednesday, but Oklahoma left Ahearn Field House with a 3-2 victory (30-16, 28-30, 26-30, 30-16, 13-15).

Coach Suzie Fritz said K-State had a win in its grasp but could not find a rhythm.

"We had every opportunity to win," Fritz said. "We out hit them, out blocked them, out dug them, and out served them in every statistical category."

After trailing 1-2, the Wildcats came back and forced a fifth game. The Sooners won game five when freshman Lauren Mathewson could not return an Oklahoma serve.

K-State finished the match with 72 team kills, led by junior outside hitter Rita Liliom, who tallied 23.

Liliom said she was pleased with her 23 kills but was looking for the win foremost.

"I think we played our game when we won," Liliom said of games one and four. "Other than that, I think we need to play better and stay together."

Liliom recorded a team-high four aces, followed by senior setter Stacey Spiegelberg, who tallied two.

Spiegelberg led the Wildcats in assists with 59.

"Rita is awesome," Spiegelberg said. "She did great tonight. She is a consistent player and has been doing really well for us."

The Sooners' keep their Big 12 Conference win-streak alive, with a 3-0 in league play. Spiegelberg said losing hurt because the Wildcats' stat sheet was more impressive.

"We just didn't come out like we should have," Spiegelberg said. "We came out kind of tentative and weren't aggressive. We have to be consistent to win these Big 12 matches."

Game five was tight and the score was tied 13-13 after a Liliom kill. Fritz said the Wildcats struggled in similar pressure situations earlier in the season.

"We had a game plan, and we didn't execute late in game five," Fritz said.

Coming into the match, K-State was rolling with five-straight sweeps, but Fritz was more concerned with the victories.

"You guys are the ones talking about the sweeps," Fritz told reporters. "We are just trying to win as many as we can."

The Wildcats' next match will be Sept. 22 as the team heads to Colorado.

WILDCAT ARCHIVES

Parr applies what he learned from coach in '50s to everyday life

The "Wildcat Archives" series will take a look back at a different K-Stater every week who was part of an important time in Wildcat sports history.

By Jonathan Garten
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Jack Parr knows he can't win every battle.

During his time on the K-State basketball team in the late 1950s, Parr faced several of the game's best players. While he didn't always dominate the stat sheet, Parr said he understood how to deal with challenging opponents.

"In the mundane world of sports, adversity is an ongoing issue," Parr said. "Whether you're talking about playing a big game against Kansas University, or a player you're guarding who out-rebounds you, the question you have to ask is, 'How are you going to deal with that adversity?'"

Parr said his coach, Tex Winter, showed him how to handle those challenges and how to respond when going up against a talented player. One of Parr's toughest foes was Kansas' Wilt Chamberlain, whom Parr had to face five times during Chamberlain's two years at KU.

Athletically and physically, Chamberlain had few equals. He ran the 100-yard dash in 10.9 seconds and won the Big Eight Conference high jump championship, clearing a height of 6-6.

But Chamberlain is best known not as a track star, but as an all-time basketball great.

In those days, freshmen could not play on the varsity team, but that didn't stop Chamberlain from dominating his older teammates during a preseason scrimmage in 1955. He scored 52 points, pulled down 29 rebounds, and led the freshmen to an 81-71 win over a varsity team that was picked to win the conference.

"I had a lot of respect for him," Parr said. "He was a phenomenal athlete."

On Feb. 3, 1958, K-State traveled to Lawrence for one of the most anticipated matchups of the season. Both teams were ranked in the top five nationally and the Wildcats never had beaten the Jayhawks while Chamberlain was on the team.

"It was huge hype," said Parr, who was a two-time All-American. "Sports Illustrated had a three- or four-page article about how significant the game was."

"It was pandemonium in Lawrence. We had to win. The excitement was at a fever pitch."

To prepare for the 7-foot-1 Chamberlain, Winter had devised a special defense to slow him down. The Wildcats would use two defenders, one positioned in front and the other behind, in an attempt to neutralize his offensive arsenal.

On the defensive side, Winter had to get creative to simulate Chamberlain's sheer size. Winter would run around the practice court with a broom to remind players how tall he was.

Even with Winter's tactics, Parr said Chamberlain still was difficult to stop, especially when he was able to rise up and dunk over K-State's double team.

"One way to deal with that is to become angry," Parr said. "That doesn't work. Another way is to resign to it and say, 'He's that good, and I'm just me.' Or you can use the old athletic cliché and say, 'When the going gets tough, the tough get going' and by damned he's not doing that again."

Parr and the Wildcats contained Chamberlain enough to send the game into double overtime. With time running out and the Wildcats leading by two, Kansas tried to go to Chamberlain to tie the game and send it into a third overtime.

But it was Parr who would get the best of KU's star player this time. As Chamberlain went up for what looked like a certain dunk, Parr blocked the shot, resulting in a jump ball call.

But following the defensive play, Parr still had to go up against Chamberlain one more time for a jump ball. Still pumped up from his previous play, the 6-foot-9 Parr out jumped the 7-foot-1 Chamberlain to win possession and cement a 79-75 win over KU.

Jack Parr earned All-America honors twice while at K-State. Despite being some of the better players in the Big Eight Conference, Parr and Kansas' Wilt Chamberlain were not allowed to play on their varsity squads until they were sophomores.

The victory helped the Wildcats win a regular season Big Eight title and led to K-State making the Final Four later that year.

Today, Parr owns a consulting firm in Salina. He said he still credits a great deal of what he knows to what he learned at K-State.

"The experience at K-State was foundational for my life," Parr said. "That experience has really had application to 40 years of being in my own business. We've done work in 14 countries and 46 states, and much of what I've picked up goes back to what I learned at K-State from coach Winter."

Ramos receives Big 12's weekly award

Sophomore Beverly Ramos named the Big 12 Runner of the Week after placing first at the Woody Greeno Invitational on Saturday.

Ramos finished the 6K race in 21 minutes, 21.85 seconds — the eighth-best 6K time in school history. Her finish helped the Wildcats take second out of 24 teams in the field.

Saturday's win was the second of the season from Ramos, a sophomore who transferred to K-State from the Universidad de Puerto Rico.

She also placed first at the K-State/KU Dual on Sept. 7.

This is the first Runner of the Week honor for the K-State's cross country team since Liliani Mendez won the award Sept. 27, 2006, of last season.

Kansas City defensive end reflects on recently completed 2-game suspension

While sitting out a two-game suspension, Jared Allen learned a couple things: Television analysts don't always know what they're talking about, and maybe couch potatoes sometimes do.

Forced to watch Kansas City's first two games on television, Allen said listening to the commentators could be frustrating.

"I haven't watched a game on Sunday since I was in college," he said. "The weirdest part is watching the game as it's played by people you play with and practice with. At times I wanted to yell, 'Shut up, you idiot. You don't know what you're talking about.'"

But the young defensive end who has recorded 27 1/2 sacks in his first three seasons was most struck by what he saw while scanning the defensive secondary to see how certain teammates were playing.

"I noticed how guys were getting back on plays, or sometimes not getting back — stuff you don't normally see when you're playing because you have your back to that part of the field," he said.

When he returned to work Monday to prepare for the Chiefs' home opener against Minnesota, Allen was quick to share this newfound insight with some of the defensive backs.

"I came in for meetings and I said, 'How could you guys misjudge this play? How could you misjudge that play?'" he said with a laugh.

"They're like, 'What are you talking about? How do you know about that?'"

But the joking was kept to a minimum. After all, Allen rejoined a team desperate for a win. The Chiefs are 0-2 for the second year in a row and lacking any offensive punch. With running back Larry Johnson still getting in game shape following his long contract hold-out, the offense has scored only 13 points and averaged just 250 yards in losses at Houston and Chicago.

PEOPLE IN THE NEIGHBORHOOD

Manhattan man active in community during harmony week

By Christine Caplinger
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

One man's presence has been frequent during the week's events to celebrate Community Cultural Harmony Week.

Richard Pitts, executive director and cofounder of the Wonder Workshop, is active during the week and has been an active member of the Manhattan and K-State communities for several years.

In what ways are you involved with the Manhattan community?

Well, I run an organization called the Wonder Workshop. Its mission is to provide arts, sciences and humanities through programs and exhibits.

How would you describe the Manhattan community?

I think that Manhattan is a cultural community. There is a lot of diversity because of the university and the Army. There are plenty of opportunities to get involved.

Ultimately, it is a good place to live where people care about each other. They care to the degree that if something happens — good or bad — they care no matter what, and I love it.

What is the most exciting part of Community Cultural Harmony Week?

Everything I have been to I have liked equally. I have gotten some ideas for kids. I have been a leader and participant. I have been to some programs, like the Underground Railroad Tour and the opening ceremony.

There were about 80 people who went to the Underground Railroad Tour, but I got so much good feedback and great energy. I also got to see five people debate on religion in the courtyard. It was a great experience — very empowering. It makes me realize that students at the university care. It allows me to be with people who think like I do and people that don't, and that's cool. It's a challenge.

For what reasons do you like to work with students on campus?

We have a lot of students who volunteer with after-school and summer programs, and also when there is a day off at school.

Lots of our volunteers come from campus. It is a big plus to have kids have one-on-one time with someone they look up to. These students are usually education students, which gives them a job and experience.

Also, it is nice being around college students, especially ones who have an interest in what we do, especially arts, sciences and humanities. It is definitely refreshing. They want to be there and always willing to get involved.

What do you consider to be your biggest achievement?

Raising my kids. I have five kids, and they are all out of the house. Three have graduated and work successfully throughout the country. If I died tomorrow, I would want to be remembered for raising a great family. I believe it is my biggest achievement.

What activities do you enjoy in your spare time?

We have a camp area 25 miles north of Manhattan. It is in a pristine wilderness. I enjoy hiking and canoeing, and it is so pretty with the peace and quiet of serenity.

If you could meet a historical figure, who would it be and why?

I really love Nansa Musa, an African king. He was one of the most well-loved and powerful kings of the Mali empire during the 14th century. He was a king who cared about people, and he helped establish trading routes on the Sahara.

Joslyn Brown | COLLEGIAN

Richard Pitts, resident of Manhattan, is an active member of the community and has participated in many Community Cultural Harmony Week activities. He also helps plan events for youth and adults through the Wonder Workshop, which he helped create in 1989.

Who has been a role model for you in your life?

My mother would be my No. 1 role model. She raised five kids and early on taught me the Golden Rule. It has helped create a good life for me. She is the invisible voice that's always in my ear.

Everyone is faced with issues, and sometimes we don't want to do the right thing. If I want to stray from the path, I think about my mom.

TO THE EDITOR

Pro-Apple columnist uninformed about PCs

Editor,

In response to the Sept. 17 column by April Newby, there are a couple key phrases stated in her piece that have led me to believe she is not only computer illiterate but deserves a Mac.

First, there is the spyware issue. I have to admit I almost choked on my Halo 3 Mountain Dew when I read she had "more than one computer ruined because they became overloaded with spyware."

Now, after these computers were "ruined," did she remember to recycle them? Everyone should know there are several free programs available online to prevent computers from being needlessly "ruined." SpyBot and Spyware Blaster are two that come to mind.

Second, Macs are not safe from spyware because of some magical property imbued by the Mac OS X operating system. They are less vulnerable to spyware because nobody uses Macs and wants to program spyware for an incompatible piece they don't use.

Third, the statement, "these applications encompass everything from iPhoto (similar to Adobe Photoshop, but better ...)"

Mac users are not the free-thinking individuals they imagine themselves to be. They buy a product that has no customization potential and no software, basically rendering their machine a worse and more expensive way to run Windows programs.

Mac users also hate money with a passion, given the amount they gleefully shell out for their trendy, right-mouse-buttonless box at expensive specialty stores.

The prices are arbitrarily set at the high level, because these stores thrive in a competition-free environment. But then, competition has never been Apple's strong point.

Product's versatility offers many meal ideas

By Ashley Frey
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

It is found in cheese dips, macaroni and cheese, casseroles, nachos, sandwiches and so much more. This food product has a wide variety of uses that usually tend to satisfy one's hunger or craving for cheese.

What is the product you ask? It is none other than Kraft Foods' Velveeta Cheese, found in a box at any grocery store.

According to Kraftfoods.com, a Swiss immigrant working at the Monroe Cheese Company in Monroe, New York named Emil Frey created the processed cheese product in 1918. The product had its own company, the Velveeta Cheese Company, by 1923 and eventually Kraft Foods bought the company in 1927.

Soon, Velveeta was packaged in the traditional boxes consumers recognize.

"It looks really disgusting at first," said Kyle Kinkade, graduate student in math. "But once you put it in with some tomatoes and hamburger, it makes a really good dip."

Velveeta can be used in a variety of ways.

"I use Velveeta in mac and cheese, cheese and crackers, cheese on my sandwiches and for cheese dip," Hannah Greene, sophomore in biology, said. "I like to use it in a lot of different things. It is also a good source of calcium."

Greene is not the only one who gets a wide variety of usage out of the rectangular-boxed cheese.

"My mom uses it in potato soup, and my aunt uses it in grilled cheese," said Susan Dolan, sophomore in apparel, textiles and marketing. "It really tastes good – better than the Kraft Singles. Also, I really don't like cheese, but I like Velveeta."

Providing more options, Velveeta has created new flavors for the cheese product. There is Velveeta 2% Milk, Velveeta Mexican Mild and Velveeta Pepper Jack.

"It is really versatile," Greene said. "You can make it into a meal or a snack if you want."

Say cheese

Lyndsey Born | COLLEGIAN

To make a Velveeta cheese dip, brown hamburger, and pour cubed cheese into a sauce pan with the hamburger. Allow the cheese to melt and mix with the hamburger. Serve the hamburger-cheese dip with tortilla chips.

Students can make 3 easy dishes using Velveeta in less than 30 minutes

CHEESY CHICKEN CHILI

Recipe Rating:

Prep Time: 10 min.

Total Time: 30 min.

Serves: 6

1-1/4 lb. boneless skinless chicken breasts, cut into chunks
2 cans (15 oz. each) chunky tomato sauce for chili
1 can (15 oz.) kidney beans, drained, rinsed
1/2 lb. (8 oz.) Velveeta, cut up

SPRAY 5-quart Dutch oven or large saucepan with cooking spray.

ADD chicken; cook and stir on medium-high heat 4 to 5 minutes or until cooked through.

STIR in remaining ingredients. Reduce heat to medium; cook until Velveeta is melted.

HOMEMADE MACARONI AND CHEESE

Recipe Rating:

Prep Time: 10 min.

Total Time: 30 min.

Serves: 6, 1 cup each

1 can (5 oz.) evaporated milk
2 eggs, lightly beaten
2 tbsp. butter or margarine, melted
1/4 to 1/2 tsp. ground red pepper
1/2 lb. (8 oz.) Velveeta, cut up
1 cup shredded cheddar cheese
2 cups (8 oz.) elbow macaroni, cooked, drained

PREHEAT oven to 350 degrees Fahrenheit. Mix milk and eggs in large bowl. Add butter, red pepper, and cheeses. Stir in macaroni; mix lightly. POUR into 1-1/2-quart casserole dish. BAKE 20 minutes or until heated through.

VELVEETA EASY SANTA FE SKILLET

Recipe Rating:

Prep Time: 5 min.

Total Time: 30 min.

Serves: 6, about 1 cup each

1 lb. ground beef
1/2 cup chopped onion
1 can (10 oz.) Ro*Tel Diced Tomatoes and Green Chilies, undrained
1 tsp. ground cumin
3 cups rotini pasta, uncooked
1/2 cup chopped green pepper
1/2 lb. (8 oz.) Velveeta, cut up

BROWN meat with onion in large skillet on medium-high heat; drain. Return to skillet.

ADD 2 cups water, tomatoes with liquid and cumin; mix well. Bring to boil. Stir in pasta and green pepper. Reduce heat to medium-low; cover. Simmer 15 minutes or until pasta is tender and water is almost absorbed, stirring occasionally.

ADD Velveeta; cook until melted, stirring frequently. Garnish with 1 tbsp. chopped cilantro if desired.

'BioShock' 3rd on charts; 'Halo' midnight-opening events planned nationwide

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

'BIO' FEEDBACK

According to the Metacritic Web site, which gathers reviews from nearly every source imaginable, the best-reviewed game in the Xbox 360's history is 2K Games' "BioShock." It's selling nicely too, finishing third on the August charts, just behind the 360 and PlayStation 2 versions of EA Sports' "Madden NFL 08."

So, naturally, 2K's parent company, Take-Two Interactive, is thinking sequel – and beyond. "BioShock" is shaping up to be a very important franchise," Take-Two Chairman Strauss Zelnick told Wall Street analysts. "I feel awfully good about where that's going."

But is "BioShock" – one of the most distinctive games in ages – really suited for sequels? Here's a better idea for Take-Two: Give creative director Ken Levine and his team as much money and time as they need to keep coming up with fresh, innovative games.

'HALO' EVERYWHERE

Even people who haven't played a video game since "Pac-Man" probably have heard something about "Halo 3." The "Halo 3" logo is everywhere, from Burger King wrappers and Mountain Dew bottles to the hood of a NASCAR vehicle. A life-size version of Master Chief, the game's hero, even is enshrined at Madame Tussaud's Las Vegas museum.

According to Microsoft, more than 10,000 stores in the United States will open their doors at midnight Sept. 25, the first day "Halo 3" will be on sale. The midnight mayhem includes four major events – in New York, Los Angeles, Seattle and Miami – where gamers will get to play "Halo 3" with "local celebrities."

In 2004, when "Halo 2" arrived, it grossed $125 million in its first 24 hours on sale. That's more than the worldwide box office generated by "Spider-Man 3" in its first day in theaters back in May. Microsoft clearly expects "Halo 3" to surpass that figure – and, perhaps more important, to goose sales of the Xbox 360, which is engaged in a fierce battle with Nintendo's Wii for home-console supremacy.

Rather files $70 million lawsuit against CBS, claims former bosses made him a 'scapegoat'

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEW YORK — Dan Rather filed a $70 million lawsuit against CBS and his former bosses Wednesday, claiming they made him a "scapegoat" for a discredited story about President Bush's military service during the Vietnam War.

The 75-year-old Rather, whose final months were clouded by controversy over the story, said the actions of the defendants damaged his reputation and cost him significant financial loss.

The lawsuit, filed in state Supreme Court in Manhattan, claims the network intentionally botched the aftermath of the story about Bush's time in the Texas Air National Guard and had Rather take the fall to "pacify" the White House. He was removed from his job at "CBS Evening News" in March 2005.

Besides CBS Corp., the suit names former CBS parent company Viacom Inc., CBS President and CEO Leslie Moonves, Viacom chairman Sumner Redstone, and Andrew Heyward, former president of CBS News. The suit seeks $20 million in compensatory damages and $50 million in punitive damages.

"These complaints are old news, and this lawsuit is without merit," said CBS spokesman Dana McClintock. Viacom had no comment.

Rather narrated a September 2004 report saying that Bush had disobeyed orders and shirked some of his duties during his National Guard service and that a commander felt pressured to sugarcoat Bush's record.

In his lawsuit, Rather maintains that the story was true, but that if any aspect of the broadcast wasn't accurate, he was not responsible for the errors.

The story relied on four documents, supposedly written by Bush's commander in the Texas Air National Guard, the late Lt. Col. Jerry Killian. Critics questioned the documents' authenticity and suggested they were forged.

A CBS review determined the story was neither fair nor accurate. CBS fired the story's producer and asked for the resignation of three executives because it could not authenticate documents used in the story, and Rather was forced out of the anchor chair he had occupied for 24 years.

Rather's lawsuit says he was forced to apologize, although "as defendants well knew, even if any aspect of the broadcast had not been accurate, which has never been established, Mr. Rather was not responsible for any such errors."

By making Rather apologize publicly, "CBS intentionally caused the public and the media to attribute CBS' alleged bungling of the episode to Mr. Rather," the lawsuit claimed. As a result, some news media called the event "Rathergate."

He also claimed that after removing him as anchor of the "CBS Evening News," the network gave him fewer and less important assignments and little airtime on "60 Minutes" and "60 Minutes II."

At the time, Rather was making $6 million a year, the lawsuit says.

Rather claimed in the suit that his departure was ultimately caused by Viacom Chairman Redstone, who found it best for the company to curry favor with the Bush administration by damaging Rather. An "enraged" Redstone said the newsman and anyone associated with him had to go, according to the lawsuit.

Richard Thornburgh, the former U.S. attorney general who made up the two-man investigative panel with Louis D. Boccia, the retired chief executive of The Associated Press, said he was unaware of Rather's lawsuit.

Reached at his home in Washington, Thornburgh said only: "Our report speaks for itself."

Boccia did not return messages left by The Associated Press.

Issued in January 2005, the 224-page report portrayed Rather as "pushed to the limit" with other stories at the time of the "60 Minutes Wednesday" report. He relied on a trusted producer and didn't check the story for accuracy or, apparently, even see it before he introduced it on the program, the panel said.

CBS rushed the story on the air and then blindly defended it when holes became apparent, said the panel, which was unable to say conclusively whether memos disparaging Bush's service were real or fake.

The fired CBS News producer, Mary Mapes, later wrote that the panel's examination of the story "read more like a prosecutorial brief than an independent investigation."

Her book surrounding the controversy was published in 2005.

Rather, who didn't return messages Wednesday, worked at CBS News starting in 1962, then replaced Walter Cronkite in 1981 as "CBS Evening News" anchor until signing off March 9, 2005.

He always considered himself a reporter first, and the habit of news anchors to travel to the scene of big stories is largely his legacy. His interview with Saddam Hussein in 2003 was the last given by the Iraqi leader before he was toppled.

With his intense on-air demeanor, Rather also had his detractors, and his broadcast was a distant third in the evening news ratings when he stepped down. CBS News' ratings rebounded under short-term successor Bob Schieffer, but they have plummeted under Katie Couric, who took over the broadcast in September 2006.

Rather has moved on to a weekly news show on cable's HDNet channel, "Dan Rather Reports," but the effort has garnered little attention. When the show launched, it was available in only 4 million homes, a small fraction of his potential audience while at CBS.

Local developer dies

By Willow Williamson
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The founder of McCullough Development – a K-State architecture graduate – died in his home Sept. 18.

Jim McCullough, a longtime Manhattan resident and loving husband and father, died of natural causes. He was 65.

He started McCullough Development, which expanded from a small company in Manhattan to having branches in six states, she said.

Throughout his career, he was involved in many different development projects.

"He was just very active in the real estate development over the years," Flouer said.

He was also instrumental in the renovation of the Wareham Hotel and Opera House, she said.

"Historical renovation was very important to him," said Peggy Flouer, retired chief operating officer of McCullough Development who worked with McCullough for 35 years.

McCullough was born June 25, 1942, in Champaign, Ill., to James and Marion McCullough, according to the Web site of Yorgensen-Meloan-Londeen Funeral Home.

McCullough is survived by his wife, Ruth, his sons James and Daren, and his granddaughter, Cory.

McCullough attended K-State and graduated in 1964 with a degree in architecture, Flouer said.

He also was a guest lecturer for the K-State architecture department.

Stan Conkwright, employee at YML Funeral Home, said a private graveside service will take place Saturday morning at the Sunrise Cemetery. A celebration of his life will be held for the public Sept. 24 from 3-5 p.m. at the Wareham Opera House.

Mental health act passes

By Brigitte Brechisen
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The U.S. Senate unanimously passed the Mental Health Parity Act of 2007 to establish equality for mental health benefits Tuesday.

"It is time we address the disparity between mental health care and medical care," said Sen. Pat Roberts, R-Kan., in a release. "People requiring mental health care need the same protections, care and understanding as those individuals suffering from physical illnesses."

According to the National Alliance on Mental Illness, the cost of the bill is expected to be kept within a manageable range for businesses.

Charles Griffin, director of the Kansas Rural Family Helpline and assistant research professor in family studies and human services, said the cost for insurance companies and businesses were well intended.

"If they are in it for the long run, they understand intervention and prevention is appropriate and cost-effective," Griffin said.

Robbin Cole, executive director of Pawnee Mental Health Services in Manhattan, people at the mental health center are glad Senate has passed the bill.

"This is a really good step towards making sure that people will be able to access mental health benefits in the amount and scope that are equivalent to other benefits in their health insurance plans," Cole said.

Professor, U.N. committee research global warming

By Scott Girard
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Much of the planet is warming because of increased carbon dioxide, and one K-State professor is sharing his knowledge of ways to curb this trend at K-State and the United Nations.

Earlier this year, Charles Rice, professor of agronomy, served on the U.N. Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change, which met occasionally for three years to compile research on climate change and release a comprehensive study. Rice served with more than 100 other climate change experts from across the world.

Rice said the committee studied the concept of climate change in three different subgroups: physical evidence of climate change, its effect on cities and regions throughout the planet, and how to reduce the effects of climate change.

Rice said though many people question the effects of global warming and climate change, much of the research on the topic from agencies, including the U.N. committee of scientists is unquestionable.

Greenhouse gases, including methane, nitrous oxide and carbon dioxide, increasingly are released into the atmosphere, trapping heat that normally would pass through the atmosphere and changing climates across the planet, Rice said.

WHAT THE PROBLEM IS

The buildup of carbon dioxide and other greenhouse gases has caused much of the planet to generally heat during the past century. According to the committee's research, the carbon dioxide levels have increased from 280 parts per million in 1750 to 379 ppm in 2005. This number exceeds the natural range of carbon dioxide levels over the past 650,000 years by almost 100 ppm, and it is still growing.

Much of the carbon dioxide increase has been caused by the burning of fossil fuels by humans. According to the report, 80 percent of the increase is from burning fossil fuels, while improper agricultural land usage accounts for almost 20 percent.

Because of the increased carbon dioxide, temperatures on the planet have risen an average of 0.6 degrees Celsius to 0.8 degrees Celsius during the last 140 years.

Rice said nearly all places on Earth are warming. In the Northern Hemisphere, temperatures are rising almost twice as much as the global average, he said. Rice said this is because temperatures rise much more over land than water, and the Northern Hemisphere has much more land area than the Southern Hemisphere.

That is also why polar ice caps are melting alarmingly fast. In recent years, Rice said a chunk of ice larger than the states of Texas, California and Maryland combined, has melted off the Arctic Circle, causing sea levels to rise several millimeters per year.

"This may not seem like a lot, but communities without significant land area will be affected greatly," he said.

The rising sea level is not the only natural phenomenon on the Bill Buzenberg, executive director for the Center of Public Integrity, was the speaker of the eighth-annual Huck Boyd Lecture in Community Media at the K-State Student Union Forum Hall on Thursday morning.

Media center director calls for return of investigative journalism

By Scott Girard
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Tough, investigative journalism needs to return to the forefront of the mainstream media, said the director of a renowned investigative journalism center yesterday at the eighth-annual Huck Boyd Lecture on Community Media.

Bill Buzenberg, executive director for the Center of Public Integrity, said the media are too concerned with superficial news about celebrities like Britney Spears and Lindsay Lohan.

"How strange is it, that at the time when technology has given us instantaneous global communication, transmission of pictures, sounds and words, we have such paltry news and information," Buzenberg said in front of a mostly full Forum Hall in the K-State Student Union.

Buzenberg compared the way reporters flock to meaningless celebrity events to a soccer game where 6-year-old kids follow the ball around the field.

He said journalists need to return to the muckraking and watchdog journalism of the past. He said reporters should look at the investigative reports of Upton Sinclair's "The Jungle," Bob Woodward and Carl Bernstein's Watergate uncovering, and other journalists' work on revealing scandals like child abuse by Catholic priest and the National Security Agency's domestic spying program.

He said some news agencies and centers like the Center of Public Integrity are trying to investigate all areas of government, but most media are not doing their part.

"I think watchdog journalism, and even muckraking, are good words," Buzenberg said. "The only problem I see is there just isn't enough of it."

He said since the center was started in 1989, it has released close to 400 major investigative reports and 17 books. These include investigations into Halliburton Energy Services and the travel habits of members in Congress.

Buzenberg said Congress members were caught making golf vacations to Scotland and other nonbusiness trips by a group of college journalists hired by the center to monitor travel records.

He said the center also spent three years researching and compiling information through lawsuits and other means just to know what Halliburton was doing in Iraq. He said about 40 percent of the government contracts to Halliburton are devoid of competition.

He said the increase of government private contracts is a major problem in the United States.

"If you only remember one thing from today," he said. "In the last five years, government has doubled contributions to private contractors."

He said the government gives close to $19 billion to the Department of Homeland Security and $25 billion to Lockheed Martin – the world's largest defense contractor – in private contracts.

"(Lockheed Martin) is almost a government in itself," he said.

Buzenberg said the United States is creating a shadow government where corporations are starting to control many aspects of the government. He also said much of the media are not doing anything about it.

He called the lack of investigative news reporting a media meltdown. He gave an example of when Time magazine fired two Pulitzer Prize-winning investigative journalists because of budget issues and a week later spent $4 million on photos of Angelina Jolie's baby.

Buzenberg also said much of the journalism industry is drifting toward the Internet

2-day Aggiefest to showcase 105 local, diverse music groups

By Emily Sterk
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Aggieville will be packed with bands performing a variety of music at different venues this weekend.

Aggiefest, a two-day fall festival, is returning for its third year today and Saturday.

Evan Tuttle, coordinator for the festival said 105 bands will perform, compared to just six bands that performed the festival's first year.

Aggiefest first became a reality because the Manhattan Music Coalition wanted local bands to get more recognition, Tuttle said.

The festival's roots go back to the live music scene of Manhattan that fizzled near the end of the 1990s. He said Manhattan has great local bands, but people do not take the time to listen to them.

"We decided to put together a huge music festival, so we did," Tuttle said. "We wanted to see it grow again."

The difference between this festival and past festivals is it will be bigger and better, Tuttle said, and the number of bands will bring a variety of genres.

"It is multi-genre. We have everything — metal to hip-hop, folk to bluegrass, rock — everything," he said.

"Lots of bands, lots of music — music everywhere — and it is insanely cheap."

He said the MMC tries to bring new acts to the festival, but it still is focused on local bands.

"We put these festivals on for our local bands to say thank you," Tuttle said. "It gives them the opportunity to network through bands from out of town — regional touring acts, national touring acts — that is how they make contacts. They are our local music scene. They are what gets us through the year."

It is not difficult for a band to get to play, Tuttle said, but if the members still want to participate in it, they need to contact the MCC immediately with a sample of their music.

He said filling spots is not difficult; determining which venue a band will perform in is the tricky part.

"We have been here a long time. We know what is appropriate and what type of crowd goes to what venue," Tuttle said.

"But we also want to mix it up so that you're encouraged to think outside your box and go to places you wouldn't normally go in Aggieville."

Tuttle said Aggiefest has a purpose, and it is not just providing Manhattan with local music. It shows people there are bands in Manhattan that are talented and worth seeing.

"Music is a universal, divine language," Tuttle said. "Everyone can relate to it. People will leave with an appreciation for independent, local artists."

Shawn Leeth, member of the MMC who booked all the bands for the festival, said Aggiefest gets better every year.

"We learn from each festival — what works, what doesn't work," Leeth said. "This is the most professional festival we have had. We are taking it a step further than the past years."

The best lesson to be learned at Aggiefest, Leeth said, is that good music is just down the street, and having to pay a cover charge is usually worth the experience.

"Realizing live music is really good takes away the stigma of paying a cover to see great, original, live music," Leeth said.

He also said the audience will leave with a renewed interest in local bands.

Tuttle said events like Aggiefest are fun and worth the time.

"Just don't miss it," Tuttle said. "It is a part of your college experience. This festival is writing the soundtrack for our town."

SGA allots $10,000 to raise Union wages

By Whitney Hodgins
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Student Senate approved an emergency allocation of $10,000 to the K-State Student Union at its meeting Thursday.

The Privilege Fee Committee allocated the funds to the Union because the committee felt it was adequate compensation for student employees who already had received a 50-cent minimum-wage increase from a statewide increase in minimum-wage requirements. New student employees will be paid a minimum of $6.50 per hour, and the SGA allotment ensures all employees will receive a 50-cent raise.

"I feel that $10,000 is adequate," said Lydia Peele, student body vice president and senior in secondary education. "An 8.5-percent increase to Union employees has already come into effect, so to allot more than what we have would set a dangerous precedence for SGA, because we would have to approve all other requests for allocations that we simply couldn't afford."

Other senators thought the $20,000 the Union originally requested was necessary, since longer-serving employees would be paid the same wage as new, less-experienced employees.

"I believe funding should be $20,000 to maintain the integrity of the pay scale of the Union," said Sarah Morton, College of Business senator and senior in accounting.

In response to statements made alleging the Union is in debt and does not deserve extra allocations, Morton clarified the Union is not in debt and does not owe money to any groups.

"There are a lot of cuts the Union could make to help lower their deficit," said Josh McGinn, College of Arts and Sciences senator and junior in history. "But we want a fully functioning Union. They value their employees, and when employees aren't happy, the level of service they provide goes down."

Five senators were sworn in to three colleges. Monica Lair, senior in hotel and restaurant management, was approved for the College of Human Ecology, and Kyle Sherwood, graduate student in interior architecture and produce design, was approved for the College of Architecture, Planning, and Design. The College of Education gained Laura Gross, senior in art education; Graham Fox, senior in secondary education; and Garret Boller, junior in secondary education.

A new leaf

People on all sides must work together to eradicate racism

Healing from racism will take time, and until that time comes, it doesn't do any good to ignore it.

On Sept. 1, 2006, the students of Jena High School in Jena, La., were greeted by a site that instantly awoke anger, and more importantly, bad memories.

TYLER SMITH

Two nooses hung from a tree in the school's central courtyard. This tree, whose shade typically kept the sun off white students' shoulders, has become a source of racial tension.

At an assembly a few days prior to the incident, a black student asked if it was OK for him to sit under the tree. According to the National Public Radio's Web site, he was told he could.

The Washington Post reported Aug. 4, there is no longer a tree in Jena High's courtyard; it was cut down by order of the district superintendent.

The tree would have had to go anyway — an arson fire that took place at the school required a huge renovation.

The fire was set intentionally, but police in nearby Alexandria said they couldn't confirm whether or not it was connected to the noose incident.

However, four days later, a fight erupted in the Jena High School yard, and six black students sent a white student to the hospital. The white student was knocked unconscious but received only minor injuries and was released from the hospital later that day.

The six students were arrested and charged with second-degree attempted murder. One was charged with using a deadly weapon. The weapon was a pair of tennis shoes.

The three boys who had first hung the nooses in the schoolyard each were given three days of suspension. One of the attackers already has been convicted of aggravated second-degree battery and conspiracy to commit aggravated second-degree battery; he could spend up to 22 years in prison. The trials for three of the others began in May.

Since this story broke, there have been some changes. A large rally occurred Thursday, and 40,000 are expected to attend, according to a USA Today article. Many leaders on both sides of the issue fear more violence, making this issue far from over.

It is easy for many people to forget these incidents still happen. Most people place blatant racism on the same page in history as faded pictures of confederate soldiers and stoic quotes from Abraham Lincoln.

It is easy to forget that in some places, not everything has changed. Every once in a while, a story like this makes its way north to Kansas, and even farther.

A few moments of outrage and disbelief came after people heard it, and then it is forgotten, because Manhattan is a long way from Jena, La.

Deep down though, people have not forgotten. Racism is a part of our history, here and everywhere. People here remember the Depression. They remember World War II. They remember racism.

The issue is still there to be challenged; it is still a problem needing to be fixed. The biggest problem facing us today is how to go about fixing it.

Different cultures should not all be merged into one, with one group conforming and the other one telling them how to do it.

It will take an equal pairing and a general acceptance, but most importantly, it will take letting go of the past. Traditions from both sides will have to change.

U.S. should turn to Israel for help against North Korea

After a short break, the Israel we know and love is back, stepping up to take on the threats against them.

According to a Sept. 16 London Times report, just after midnight on the morning of Sept. 6, Israeli F-15s traveled 50 miles from the Iraqi border. Once in position, the Israeli planes destroyed a "cache of nuclear materials from North Korea."

Israeli intelligence had been watching a North Korean ship that changed its identity to South Korean just before entering the port of Tartous in Syria.

It's ironic to see a North Korean freighter enter Syrian territory on Sept. 3, the New York Times reported North Korea "agreed to disable its main nuclear-fuel production plant by the end of the year and to account to international monitors for all of its nuclear programs."

The 1,700-ton freighter was loaded with what Syrian government officials called cement.

North Korea can't build adequate infrastructure, but they can ship 1,700 tons of cement to Syria.

I guess the government officials in Pyongyang are having a close-out sale: "everything must go — it will blow you away."

There are conflicting opinions thinks Syria is either trying to acquire weapons of mass destruction for North Korea or transport those weapons to Iran. Either way, Syria and Iran both are connected through their desires for WMDs.

The Jerusalem Post finally reported Sept. 18 that Iranian and Syrian scientists died in a July 28 explosion while attempting to place sarin nerve gas filled warheads in their Scud missiles.

Since we began the war in the Middle East, the United States has continued to sit on the Israelis to keep them uninvolved. Our thought was, "If we unleashed the hounds and allowed them to help us, it would make the situation worse."

Tensions between Israel and Syria have been high since the end of the Israel-Hezbollah war. These tensions also increased with Iran, who funded and supplied Hezbollah with arms and promised to drive Israel into the Red Sea.

Syria and Iran recently have brought North Korea into their weapons-trading club.

While the United States might be selective from whom they ask help, other countries around the world are uniting under one common goal — bringing down the United States and their allies.

This unholy alliance could place our troops in Iraq in more danger. According to Gen.

Petraeus' congressional testimony, Iran is fighting a proxy war in Iraq, which means these weapons passing from Syria and North Korea could end up in the hands of Shiite militias fighting our troops.

The time has come to allow Israel to help us in a more proactive manner. During the Cold War, we made the mistake of supporting groups we are now fighting; however, Israel and the United States have trusted each other more than 50 years.

As the strain in the Middle East increases and more countries become involved, the United States can not be the only strong military force in the region. We need the help of allies who are strong and willing to stand next to us.

TO THE POINT

Students should know both views

In recent years the global-warming debate has come to a sweltering point.

This issue and many others have increased the divisions between those on either side of the issue. The editorial board, like most of the nation, has divisions on the issue.

Putting our opinions aside, we still encourage students to examine the research done by Charles Rice, professor of agronomy, and his team. K-State should be honored to have a faculty member who served on such a prestigious organization like the U.N. Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change.

Rice's time and effort over the past three years gives credit to the type of faculty we have on this campus.

The solutions provided by Rice's research will affect each of us. In hopes of decreasing our carbon-dioxide levels, Rice sees nuclear power and increased biofuel production as viable options.

Kansas farmers will benefit from the increase in biofuel production, but need to examine the no-tillage practices and the possible risks to crops, which Scott Staggenborg, associate professor of agronomy, has researched.

The risks from a no-tilling practice include "the increase of pests and disease as well as cold, damp soil conditions in the spring that slow growth." However, Staggenborg believes the reduction in greenhouse gases outweigh the risks.

Information on both sides of this debate exists, and we encourage students to examine each aspect of the issue and continue to support K-State students and faculty in their research here and abroad.

6 panelists discuss diversity of religion coverage in media

By Adrienne DeWeese
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The mass media in the United States must strive for better coverage of religious topics, said a Kansas City Star faith columnist Thursday afternoon during a panel discussion.

Bill Tammeus, an award-winning reporter on religion, moderated a six-member panel on religion and the media in the K-State Student Union. He said newspapers and other media often short-change faith coverage and cover it haphazardly. News consumers and readers have a responsibility in demanding better coverage, Tammeus said.

"You have the opportunity to change things as a consumer of journalism," he said.

Panelists represented five different faiths, including Islam, Judaism, Protestantism, Catholicism and Hinduism. Panelists included Faid Al-Salim, assistant professor of history; Mark Weiss, professor of anatomy and physiology; David Jones, Ecumenical Campus Ministries of Cross-Roads campus pastor; Subbarat Muthukrishnan, distinguished professor of biochemistry; John Carlin, former Catholic priest; and Bill Buzenberg, Center for Public Integrity executive director.

Buzenberg said there are four assumptions about religion where the media is wrong — religion must be a crutch; religion is subjective; religion is about what people believe; and the notion that religious dynamics are new and surprising.

"The coverage is so bad, and it needs to be nuanced and intelligent," Buzenberg said of the media's coverage of religion.

Buzenberg started National Public Radio's "Speaking on Faith," a one-hour weekly program that addresses one religious subject in depth. On the show, Buzenberg said people are allowed to tell their personal stories and generalities are not made about their respective faiths.

"Let people talk in their own way about their own experience," he said. "Those are very compelling stories."

Weiss said he is looking for opportunities within the media to share his faith in a respectful way and raise the awareness of Judaism.

"While I don't necessarily feel like we have to be out there in the front page, the opportunity to be recognized is appreciated," Weiss said. "But it's not expected, and we're not going to be hunting for it."

Jones said he always has had an interest in the interplay of religion in American culture, especially in topics like politics, social status and militarism.

"I think that democracies such as ours require an educated citizenry, and that means people who understand that morality cannot be divorced from politics and economics and religion," he said. "It requires a strong, effective and independent media to facilitate the development of well-educated citizens."

David Jones, campus pastor of Ecumenical Campus Ministry of CrossRoads, speaks to attendees Thursday in the K-State Student Union during a panel discussion on religious coverage in the media. Five different religious views were represented on the panel. The Huck Boyd National Center for Community Media sponsored the event, which was a part of Community Cultural Harmony Week.

of K-State's 19th-annual Community Cultural Harmony Week.

An understanding of different religions allows people to have a basic understanding of history, economics, politics and other subjects in today's society, said Gloria Freeland, Huck Boyd National Center for Community Media director and assistant professor of journalism and mass communications.

Freeland said she thought it was important that the panelists discussed the interplay of religion of different societal issues. She also said it is important for the media to get all sides of an issue, not just extremists' views.

"Each individual represents a different faith, but they weren't speaking on behalf of their faith," she said. "They were very respectful of each other, and you could tell they know about each others' respective faiths."

Fritz will produce great team

Behind every great team there is a great leader, and the K-State volleyball team has one.

Led by seventh-year coach Suzie Fritz, the No. 16 Wildcats (10-3, 2-1) are ready for the heart of Big 12 Conference play.

All great coaches tend to be great recruiters, and Fritz fits that mold. She somehow convinced a 6-foot-3 Russian outside hitter and a Puerto Rican libero that K-State was the place to be.

Nataly Korobkova, a native of Krasnoyarsk, Russia, was selected as the Preseason Big 12 Newcomer of the Year. She is leading the Wildcats in kills.

You can't forget about Angie Lastra. The libero is undoubtedly K-State's best defensive weapon, leading the Wildcats in digs with 188. Lastra is not only leading the Wildcat squad, but she has written herself into the record books. She has tallied more career digs than any other Wildcat.

Korobkova and Lastra are perhaps K-State's two best weapons and are brought to you by Fritz from thousands of miles away. I don't know how she does it.

Fritz has won Big 12 Coach of the Year twice and is already K-State's second-winningest coach. Her 2003 team won the Big 12 title, was 30-5 on the season and featured two All-Americans. Fritz's other teams have been great as well, with five of six squads making the NCAA Tournament.

It would have been six in a row, if not for last season. I wish I didn't have to bring up last season, but K-State did finish second to last in the Big 12.

Fritz has made a clear statement to reporters several times recently regarding last season. She always says something like, "I'm so tired of talking about last year."

Maybe I should be tired of talking about last year also, but I keep doing it. The reason is because I truly believe the 2006 season was a fluke.

Don't be surprised if you see the Wildcats finish in second or third place in the conference this season. Maybe some of you volleyball newbies are wondering why K-State can't finish first in the Big 12.

Nebraska is still in the conference and is the reigning national champs. Sorry Wildcats, you can't win the league this year. A few other teams will compete and Fritz will bring her squad to compete.

Fritz is among the top Big 12 coaches and has an established record. She brings intensity to every match and has an extremely competitive spirit. She said she will always push her team to work harder and loves improving.

"You're rarely going to find me feeling great," Fritz said. "That's just not the way I tick, I guess."

It's time for the purple and white to return to the top of the Big 12, and Fritz will carry her squad there. I have no idea what volleyball coaches get paid, but it sounds like Fritz is due for a raise.

SEASON PREVIEW

Focused on the future

No. 1 single's player Viviana Yrureta and the K-State women's tennis team enter the season hoping to avoid the injuries that hindered the squad last season. Seniors Fernanda Da Valle and Olga Klimova were among a couple of the Wildcat tennis players who were sidelined with injuries during the 2007 spring season.

Coach expects team's seniors to help freshmen 'adapt'

By Mike DeVader
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The key for the K-State tennis team to have a successful fall season is really quite simple: Spend more time on the court and less time in the trainer's room.

Coach Steve Bietau said he thinks the biggest concern entering the year is trying to get his team healthy.

"It has been really hard to figure out what kind of team we have because of all the injuries," Bietau said. "We just need to get healthy before we can put all the pieces into place."

Last spring, Fernanda Da Valle and Olga Klimova suffered knee injuries.

The Wildcats will play in the first of four fall tournaments this weekend when the squad travels to Tulsa, Okla.

Three returning players have solidified themselves as contributors to the team.

Leading the way will be the team's No. 1 player for the spring, senior Viviana Yrureta. Yrureta played in the No. 1 position throughout 2007 and finished with a 4-8 record in Big 12 action.

Also returning is junior Katerina Kudlackova.

Da Valle started the spring season in the No. 5 position but ascended to the No. 2 spot in the lineup. She tallied a record of 7-9 overall and 3-4 in the Big 12, including two separate three-match win streaks.

Kudlackova saw action at the No. 3 and 4 positions throughout the 2007 season and had a record of 5-5 in the Big 12 and 7-11 overall. She won three consecutive Big 12 matches from April 7-14.

With three seniors this season, Bietau said he likes the leadership the younger players have to look up to.

"The seniors have to be the ones to help others adapt," Bietau said. "They have to set the standards for the other players, and they also have to be the ones that should do things without thinking."

The signing of two highly regarded freshmen, Antea Huljev and Pauline Guemas, will bring much-needed young talent to the team.

"I expect Antea Huljev to contribute immediately because of her great serve and strong game," he said.

Bietau said he thinks Guemas' adaptability will make her successful.

"She has the body type of a typical freshman, but once she builds her body up, she will be very successful," he said.

With the blend of leadership and talented young players, Bietau said he expects nothing but good results this season.

"There is a very small difference between being good and being average, so we have a lot of work to do," Bietau said. "We always look to finish in the top half of the Big 12, but if we play good, we have a great chance to make it to the NCAA's."

SEASON OUTLOOK

Coach:

Steve Bietau (24th season)
2006 finish: 11-10 overall, 6-5 Big 12

Familiar Faces:

Fernanda Da Valle
Viviana Yrureta
Katerina Kudlackova

Newcomers to watch:

Antea Huljev
Pauline Guemas

Schedule:

Sept. 21-23: Tulsa Tournament in Tulsa, Okla.
Oct. 5-7: Hoosier Classic in Bloomington, Ind.
Oct. 17-21: ITA Central Regional in Tulsa, Okla.
Nov. 2-4: ASU Thunderbird Invitational in Tempe, Ariz.

Three questions:

1. Will the injuries from last year have lingering effects on this season?
2. How will the freshmen adapt to college competition?
3. Will the Wildcats be able to build on the 11-10 record of a year ago?

Wildcats make trip to Colorado after 1st conference loss

By Joel Jellison

VOLLEYBALL

What: K-State at Colorado
When: 7:30 CST
Who: No. 16 K-State (10-3), Colorado (5-5)

- The Buffaloes are 1-0 against ranked opponents
- K-State has lost the last two meetings with Colorado
- The Wildcats are 8-13 when playing at Colorado

With its first conference loss now a memory, the K-State volleyball team will take to the road Saturday for a match against Colorado.

The No. 16 Wildcats (10-3) lost a hard-fought match with Oklahoma on Wednesday.

K-State put up better numbers than the Sooners but lost in five games.

It was the end of a five-match winning streak for K-State in which the Wildcats swept each of the five opponents.

Colorado has had an up-and-down season so far and comes into the match with a 5-5 record.

The Buffaloes lost their Big 12 home-opening match Wednesday to Baylor in five games, squandering a lead late in the fifth game.

Colorado already has experienced success against a ranked opponent this season, beating California during the Colorado Invitational.

All five of Colorado's wins have come by way of a sweep.

It has been a close series for the Wildcats and Buffaloes, with K-State holding an 11-9 record in the past 20 meetings.

Colorado leads the overall series 25-16 and beat K-State twice last season.

The match will take place at 7:30 p.m. Saturday at the Coors Events Center in Boulder, Colo.

Baseball team opens fall schedule

Coming off its first post-season appearance since 2002, the K-State baseball team began its fifth season under head coach Brad Hill Wednesday as fall practices started in preparation for the 2008 season.

The Wildcats will hold 32 practices over the next six weeks, culminating with the fall World Series, scheduled for Oct. 28 through Nov. 2.

K-State is coming off one of the most successful seasons in recent history, finishing 34-24 and 10-6 in Big 12 Conference play.

The Wildcats return eight position starters, three starting pitchers and All-American closer Daniel Edwards, who tied the single-season saves record with 11 in 2007.

Missouri hopes to learn from K-State's close call against Illinois State

As No. 25 Missouri prepares for Division I-AA opponent Illinois State, the Tigers don't need to find motivation from what happened to Michigan three weeks ago.

On Sept. 1, Appalachian State upset then-No. 5 Michigan 34-32. Illinois State (2-1) nearly pulled off a similar upset in the 2006 opener, losing to Kansas State 24-23 when a 2-point conversion try failed.

After cracking the top 25 for the first time this season, the Tigers (3-0) are aware of the potential for an upset in Saturday's game at Faurot Field.

"I think everyone knows how close they played K-State last year," Missouri quarterback going Daniel said. "They're going to be ready, and they're not going to be worried about anything."

In fact, Illinois State has a recent history of playing well against big-time opponents. In 2005, the Redbirds and Iowa State were tied 15-15 late in the third quarter before the Cyclones pulled away. In 2003, Illinois State gained 511 yards against Illinois. And in 2004, the Redbirds had 480 total yards against Minnesota.

"You spend just as much time preparing yourself for what's going to be thrown at you as you would an Oklahoma, Miami, Nebraska or whatever you're going to be facing," Daniel said.

Coach Gary Pinkel can become the first-ever Missouri coach to begin three seasons 4-0 with a win. He's concerned about an Illinois State offense that is averaging 400 yards per game.

Luke Drone, a three-year starter, has a passer rating of 134, while running back Rafael Rice has rushed for 132.7 yards per game. In a season-opening loss to Drake, Rice gained 218 yards.

FRIDAY FACTOID

Janitor rang Anderson bell daily for 83 years Old Anderson Hall Bell.

Steven Doll | COLLEGIAN

Was there ever an actual bell that rang in Anderson Hall, instead of the recordings that create the chimes today?

For 83 years, a bell located in the Anderson Hall bell tower was rung daily by a university janitor.

The janitor rang the bell every school day at 7:45 and 7:55 a.m. and 12:45 and 12:55 p.m. to signal the beginning of classes, and also on special occasions. The bell was used until 1965, when it was replaced by an electronic machine that sounded exactly like the real bells. This recording still is used today.

During the 83 years of bell ringing, it was only late once. In 1905, a group of five students, including Harry Umberger, future dean and namesake of Umberger Hall, stole the bell clapper, which is pulled to clap the inside of the bell. The janitor had to climb the belfry to ring the bell by clanging a hammer against it. The clapper was not returned for 91 years, when one group member's daughter finally sent it to the university.

The 513-pound bell originally was donated to the former Bluemont College in 1861. The bell was moved to Anderson Hall in 1882, where it remained until 1993. The bell was moved to its current location outside Bluemont Hall in 1995. It is older than any building on campus.

There are several names and graduation classes written in chalk on the inside of the bell.

Performer to paint, dance simultaneously

By Monica Castro
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Families have the opportunity to witness a dance and art performance in one during Family Day on Saturday.

Richard Hight, the Visual Impact artist, will paint and dance in Bosco Student Plaza at 2 p.m. Hight said he is looking forward to meeting K-State families and alumni.

He said since this is his first time at K-State, he wants his performance to inspire everyone to be special and different.

Hight said he calls himself a performing visual artist because he dances while painting. He also said he paints and chooses his music based on the audience.

"On stage, once the music starts, I turn around in the canvas and get lost in my zone and forget the audience is there," Hight said.

While dancing and drawing, Hight said he wants to entice his audience to stay for the conclusion of his artwork. Hight will create two works of art Saturday, and the pieces will stay at K-State.

"I want the audience to know and feel the passion about what I am doing on stage," Hight said. "That is my main goal."

Ben Hopper, Union Program Council program adviser, said he is happy to have Hight perform for Family Day. Hopper said several UPC members had seen Hight perform at conferences and they were fortunate to have him perform because he uses such an interesting way to create artwork.

Hopper said he has witnessed Hight create the American flag, an eagle and the Statue of Liberty, and is excited to see his creation this weekend.

"It is pretty spectacular to watch because he starts out with a blank canvas, and through the course of his songs, he creates a masterpiece," Hopper said.

Hopper also said that it was spectacular to watch him because he paints in a way that an audience does not see the finished product until the end.

Emily Lehning, assistant dean of student life, said she is excited to have Visual Impact as a new addition to Family Day because it is a different activity for the family to enjoy.

"Visual Impact is a unique way to bring all ages to come together and watch, especially because it is Family Day," Lehning said.

FAMILY DAY EVENT CALENDAR

ROLL ON OVER

Time: 8-10 a.m.

Place: Frith Community Center

Start the day at Jardine Apartment Complex with tours and complimentary cinnamon rolls and coffee from the Housing and Dining Services Bakery.

GLOBAL | K-State researchers work to decrease carbon dioxide emissions

rise. According to the report, the planet is virtually certain – more than 99 percent certain – to experience more warmer and fewer cold days and nights and is very likely, which means more than 90 percent certain – to experience more heat waves and more heavy precipitation events – like hurricanes and typhoons.

The committee said most of these trends started in the late 1990s, but members were more than 50 percent certain the trends were caused by humans.

"The U.N. panel is quite certain that we are having global warming," Rice said.

And the globe will continue to warm. Rice said even if everyone does all they can to reduce carbon-dioxide emissions, carbon-dioxide levels would stabilize at 500 ppm. He said in actuality, it is more likely to double during the next 100 years.

SOLUTIONS

Rice said the most effective way to reduce carbon-dioxide levels is to reduce the world's reliance on fossil fuels. He said nuclear power, wind power and the introduction of biofuels are just some of the many alternatives to fossil fuels.

Another way to reduce carbon dioxide is through a process known as soil-carbon sequestration, which basically allows plants and fields to retain more carbon than usual.

"We're not going to reduce reliance on fossil fuels overnight, so another viable strategy is to come up with a way to sequester carbon dioxide out of the atmosphere," Rice said.

Rice said soil-carbon sequestration can reduce carbon-dioxide emissions by about 25 percent during the next 20 years.

Rice said he was recommended to the U.N. committee by the United States because of his extensive agricultural research background with this process.

K-State has studied the effects of carbon sequestration on carbon levels and the environment for several years on research fields throughout Kansas. Rice said he sends briefings to Congress about his research a few times a year.

There are several ways to sequester carbon dioxide from the air, Rice said. One of the easiest ways is to leave plant residue on fields, instead of tilling it. The way to leave this residue to reduce carbon-dioxide emissions is to adopt no-tillage practices, which means no tearing rows of fields for crops.

Instead, new equipment allows farmers to plant seeds individually. Scott Staggenborg, assistant professor of agronomy, said this reduces erosion and residue rotting, which keeps the carbon dioxide in the soil.

"The part of the soil you lose is the stuff on top, and that has the highest percentage of carbon dioxide," Staggenborg said.

Staggenborg said no-tillage practices have some drawbacks, including the increase of pests and disease; cold, damp soil conditions in the spring that slow growth are also a result. Staggenborg said the benefits, which include increased shade during warm summer months, possible tilling cost reductions and the reduction of greenhouse gases, far outweigh the risks.

Rice said the sod residue could have other benefits as well.

"It has additional environmental benefits because increasing carbon levels improves the quality of the soil," Rice said.

Another method to reduce carbon-dioxide is to develop larger plants that absorb more carbon dioxide through the process of photosynthesis, Staggenborg said.

"The more the plant grows, the more carbon they take in," Staggenborg said. "That's the key: photosynthesis."

Rice said, until now, not all farmers have warmed up to the idea of no-tillage or other carbon-sequestration practices because of the cost or extra work. He said the government is developing markets where farmers can sell their stored carbon. According to the Consortium for Agricultural Soil Mitigation of Greenhouse Gases – a group of nine universities researching sequestration – the market could increase the carbon-storage market from $1 million to $5 million a year during the next 30 to 40 years.

Rice said the profiteering of climate change initiatives is not restricted to soil mitigation.

"In two to four years, I think we will have a climate-change policy," Rice said. "People now see the opportunity to use economic gain to reduce carbon dioxide."

Rice said the United States needs a national climate-change initiative. Though states and larger cities have adopted policies, Rice said the country needs national consistency.

Soil mitigation is only part of the solution to reducing greenhouse gases. In 20 years, the soil will not be able to handle any more carbon dioxide, Staggenborg said.

"It will give us some time to develop other ways of conservation, like alternative fuels," Staggenborg said.

MEDIA | Director encourages better reporting

and away from print media, but media companies have not figured out a way to sustain solid investigative journalism.

"As of now, no online business model has been made that can sustain this type of time-consuming operation," he said.

He said the country needs to find a way to sustain this form of journalism to properly inform citizens of the news.

"We need a watchdog, muckraking and courageous press that stirs up trouble in the best meaning of the word,"

he said. "A news media that is willing to dig up facts and make them public."

After the lecture, Buzenberg answered various questions from the crowd, including what advice he had for journalism students.

He responded that students need to be aware of the growing influence of the Web, but that this should not change journalism professionalism or the job market.

"The online world really takes good writing, reporting, photos and overall journalism like everything else," he said.

Gloria Freeland, director of the Huck Boyd Center for Community Media and assistant professor in journalism and mass communications, said students could learn valuable lessons from the lecture.

"Investigative journalism is important to democracy, honestly," Freeland said. "I just think we need to get back to good, strong investigative journalism, and that starts with the students."

Aaron Kadavy, freshman in agricultural communications, said he liked Buzenberg's different perspective on the media, which gave him a new perspective on the future of journalism.

"I think it really had a nice message for students," Kadavy said. "It is important for students to understand media ... That sort of information is something we need to have in the open so people can make their own decisions."

Freeland said the lecture had a strong message for all forms of media outlets and consumers.

"No matter where you live, you need to be involved in the community," she said. "And there's always going to be issues we need to be informed about as citizens."

TV FALL LINE UP

Anticipated return

NBC delivers another season of hit sitcoms

Arising like a phoenix from the ashes of boring television, Sept. 27 marks the premiere of the fourth season of "The Office" on NBC.

Easily the funniest show on network television this fall, it is also the show I am most looking forward to watching.

The last time anyone saw the employees of Dunder Mifflin, Ryan (B.J. Novak) got the job at corporate, Jim (John Krasinski) and Pam (Jenna Fischer) are finally going out on a date and Jan (Melora Hardin) and Michael (Steve Carell) might be moving in together.

After half a season of awkward interactions between Karen (Rashida Jones) and everyone else in the Scranton, Penn., office, Jim ditched Karen and asked Pam out on a date. We all knew the two had feelings for each other and when Pam told Jim she called off her wedding for him — it was just a matter of time.

Soon after moving back to Scranton, Jim showed signs that he no longer wanted to be with Karen. His freakout when she tried to get an apartment two blocks from him was very telling, as was his willingness to talk to Pam about it. The real giveaway was when Dwight (Rainn Wilson) found Pam crying on a bench in the hall. All speculation ended when the season finale ended with Jim setting up a date with Pam.

An interesting cliffhanger: What happened to Karen? Last we saw her, she left Jim at the interview to go eat lunch with some friends. If I know Karen like I think I do, she will try and talk things out with Jim.

Also, what went on between David (Andy Buckley) and Jim during the interview? Going into the interview, I thought Jim was a lock for the job. Then he found the note Pam left him.

How about Michael and Jan? Last report from corporate was that Ryan Howard got the job and Jan was out. Was she under the influence of the painkillers when she came back to the office attempting to get back with Michael?

Only time will tell what the future holds, but one thing is certain: we are all in for a laugh-packed, season of "The Office."

30 ROCK

In addition to "The Office," NBC will have another season of "30 Rock," a behind-the-scenes show about the life of the lead writer for a sitcom. While this is no "The Office," I still am looking forward to watching the new season that starts Oct. 4.

The first season of "30 Rock" went very well, receiving rave reviews from critics and fans alike, though the show got a little weird toward the end when Liz (Tina Fey) started dating Floyd (Jason Sudeikis.)

While there are not very many dramatic cliffhangers from last season other than Jack's (Alec Baldwin) health and Liz and Floyd's relationship. Fans can look forward to a funny season.

TV DRAMA

'Grey's Anatomy' to answer questions from 3rd season

"Grey's Anatomy," the hospital drama on ABC, returns for its fourth season on Sept. 27.

Leaving many unanswered questions, the premiere promises to be just as exciting as last season's drama-filled finale.

According to www.grey-anatomyinsider.com, the last time viewers saw Izzie, (Katherine Heigl) she was professing her love for George (T.R. Knight).

Through all this, George's wife Callie (Sara Ramirez) receives the position of chief resident, sending many residents in the hospital into a tizzy.

Burke's (Isaiah Washington) wedding to Cristina (Sandra Oh), is on hold after Cristina can not walk down the aisle at the wedding.

When Cristina returns home, she finds Burke has left the house and taken some of his personal belongings.

Derek (Patrick Dempsey)

and Grey's (Ellen Pompeo) relationship is on the rocks because of Grey's flightiness.

The episode also saw the departure of two doctors. Addison Shepherd (Kate Walsh) left the hospital to start her own practice, and Burke is gone for good.

For the answers to these questions and more, be sure to tune into the season premiere Sept. 27 on ABC.

YOUR LIFE

Being youngest not so bad

Being the youngest child is definitely not a joyride, and when your siblings are less than a year apart from each other, it makes life a little more difficult.

Growing up as the youngest, I had to fend for myself. I did not have a sibling close to my age to team up with. Being the youngest is hard, but as I got older, the eight and seven-year age gaps got smaller.

Jonathan is the oldest. He got straight A's throughout school and was great at every sport he played. He was a popular, smart, always-gets-the-girl-all-star. Even as an adult, he thrives in everything he does.

Rebekah is the middle child, which is almost even harder than being the youngest. She was blessed with being only 18 months younger than Jonathan. She is beautiful, athletic and musically talented. She always had a date for dances and was instantly popular — not only because of her wit and charm but for being the attractive little sister of "Sterk." Together they formed an alliance that was impossible to break.

Growing up, I had to go to all their activities, whether it was a baseball game or an orchestra concert. Did they have to come to mine? No.

I knew at a very young age being the youngest was a curse. I did not get away with anything. Forget trying to sneak out, and forget going to parties. Jonathan and Rebekah had set a trap for their annoying little sister.

Going into high school I was still called, "Jonathan and Rebekah's little sister." I had to find something that totally separated me from my siblings, something they would not have been involved in, something that gave me my name back.

I was involved in three main activities: Young Life, marching band and youth group. And through this search to separate myself from Jonathan and Rebekah, I realized being the youngest is not bad.

Being the youngest put annoying restrictions in my life, like, having a curfew or having to call home when I changed locations. I didn't get to do certain activities until a certain age, simply because my siblings did not get to do something until that age. There were parents, teachers and coaches comparing the three of us, mistaking their name for mine, and I could never get out of the mold of "the little sister."

I learned slowly that without my older siblings, I would not have been blessed with being their little sister and having two heroes to look up to.

Now that I am in college, the "little" from "little sister" has finally been dropped. We are all grown up with our own lives. The age gap is still there, but it does not seem as large.

I love being their sister. Jonathan taught me how to take care of my hand when I burned it on the stove. He also taught me how to punch someone in the eye. He is always willing to help me with my schoolwork.

Rebekah taught me how to talk to boys and how to put on makeup.

Together they helped me find my favorite type of music. They taught me how to prepare for high school and college, how to stick up for myself and how to weasel my way out of situations. I thought those two were conspiring against me, but they never were.

There was no trap. There was no alliance. I am just younger.

Heritage month to feature 'Encuentro'

By Adrienne DeWeese
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Hispanic Heritage Month events at K-State will feature the first Midwest Hispanic American Leadership Organization Encuentro.

Encuentro, which means "gathering," will include a mariachi band performance; baile, or traditional Mexican dancing; and keynote speaker Rodolfo Arévalo, Eastern Washington University president.

Arévalo, a first-generation college graduate whose parents were migrant workers, will talk about the struggles he has faced. Arévalo's keynote speech will inspire Hispanics and other ethnicities alike, said Jorge Mendoza, H.A.L.O. member and junior in biology.

"You have to be persistent in pursuing your dreams," Mendoza said of Arévalo's experiences. "Things won't be easy, but if you are consistent about your goals, you are going

President Bush announced Thursday morning Secretary of Agriculture Mike Johanns will resign his post.

Johanns was appointed in 2005 and served as Secretary of Agriculture for nearly three years. According to CNN.com, he might seek an open seat in the U.S. Senate from his home state of Nebraska.

As Johanns departs, Deputy Secretary Chuck Conner will take the position of acting Agriculture Secretary. Sen. Pat Roberts, R-Kan., is a senior member of the Senate Agriculture Committee and voiced appreciation for the progress Johanns made.

Visual Impact artist Richard Hight of Tulsa, Okla., puts the finishing touches on his eight-minute landscape artwork Saturday afternoon as a part of Family Day. Hight used queen-size bedsheets as his canvas to create the chalk-drawn piece.

Visual Impact performer dances, creates illustrations with chalk Richard Hight approached his canvas like a conductor of an orchestra.

Hugging a piece of chalk in his right hand, Hight drew on a queen-sized bedsheets that covered a canvas that was 6 feet by 8 feet. His strokes matched the rises and falls of the music, and he released his strokes after an instrument released its phrase.

He moved like a dancer in his blue jeans, loose T-shirt and baseball hat. He tapped his toes and swayed with the instrumental music that blared from the speakers.

Within eight minutes, Hight threw down his chalk at the last note of the song and bowed in exhaustion, showing the landscape he created. The audience immediately applauded, and Hight proudly held up his chalk-caked fingers with a smile.

Hight, a Tulsa, Okla., artist and inspirational speaker, performed and created two pieces of artwork during Family Day in Bosco Student Plaza Saturday afternoon.

Hight, also known as the Visual Impact artist, said he does not perform to background music — he gives it an identity.

"What I try to do is put a face on music," he said. "If it's rockin' or if it is classical, I'm like a dancer trying to put a face to it."

Hight said he got his start in junior-high school after his classmates challenged him to draw over the homework assignments that covered the chalkboard. He had to draw fast, he said, because he and his classmates had no idea when their teacher would return.

"I thought I was going to be some class hero," Hight said.

Years later, Hight said he was on top of the Berlin Wall drawing an eagle when it came down in November 1989. He also has performed at Billy Graham crusades and the Kentucky Derby. He makes about 200 appearances in front of about one million people each year, he said.

Hight's second performance featured patriotic songs like "Freedom," "America the Beautiful" and "The Power of the Dream." He mouthed the words and occasionally stepped back from the canvas to quickly take inventory of his work.

For the creation of a bald eagle, Hight started outward and worked his way in with large

AggieFest offers variety of music in many venues in the 'Ville

Music lovers flocked to Aggieville over the weekend to watch more than 90 band performances at various bars in Aggieville including a performance by The Applesseed Cast at the KatHouse.

Auntie Mae's featured country-style music with a touch of bluegrass and mellow rock, while calm and "get-lost-in-your-thoughts" music could be found at The Dusty Bookshelf. Longhorn's was filled with sounds from the '60s, and the KatHouse and Rusty's were all about rock. Heavy metal head-banging bands were at PJ's Bar, and rap artists were found at O'Malley's.

The venues involved with the third annual AggieFest Friday and Saturday were loaded with bands of all different genres.

More than 90 bands performed during the two-day event, sponsored by the Manhattan Music Coalition (MMC).

Dot Tucker, MMC member, said AggieFest brings people together, no matter what their ages.

"It is about the music,"

Tucker said. "It is about the kids, a place to share their music; we become a family."

Auntie Mae's, Rusty's and The Dusty Bookshelf featured melodic, soft music, including Monica Tyree.

Tyree performed at Auntie Mae's and said music helps the heart heal. She said AggieFest is a good place to find bands with heartfelt lyrics.

"A lot of my songs touch the soul," Tyree said. "They help me get emotions out, and help people not only feel emotion, but maybe shed a tear if they need to."

Bart Carroll, senior in computer science, said he really enjoyed Tyree and her low, rough voice.

"She is original," Carroll said. "She sang from the heart. Her songs mean something, whether it was about divorce, military or her family."

Another band at Auntie Mae's was The Brittle Lens. They were more upbeat but calm with their lyrics.

Bryce Abood, drummer for The Brittle Lens, said the band loves performing and appreciates when people stop and listen to the lyrics.

"We want the audience to leave with the feeling that they just heard a story," Abood said. "To the passerby, it's really good music, but to a true listener the lyrics have a deeper meaning."

Clara Perret, senior in mass communications, said AggieFest is great for local bands and also the college students who attend.

"It is a great way for the bands to get noticed, but it starts out with the students liking them, and they pass it on," Perret said.

Erica Smith, sophomore in English, said she preferred this year's AggieFest over last year's because of the variety of music, but she wishes there were more options for students who are

THIS WEEK

A look at events that occurred during this week in history, other bizarre holidays, happenings

TODAY 1789: 1ST SUPREME COURT ESTABLISHED

The Judiciary Act of 1789 was passed by Congress and signed by President George Washington, establishing the Supreme Court of the United States as a tribunal of six justices who were to serve on the court until death or retirement. Washington nominated John Jay to preside as chief justice, and John Rutledge, William Cushing, John Blair, Robert Harrison and James Wilson to be associate justices. On Sept. 26, the Senate confirmed all six appointments.

TUESDAY 1957: CENTRAL HIGH SCHOOL INTEGRATED

Under escort from the U.S. Army's 101st Airborne Division, nine black students entered all-white Central High School in Little Rock, Ark.

Three weeks earlier, Arkansas Gov. Orval Faubus surrounded the school with National Guard troops to prevent its federal court-ordered racial integration.

After a tense standoff, President Dwight D. Eisenhower federalized the Arkansas National Guard and sent 1,000 Army paratroopers to Little Rock to enforce the court order.

THURSDAY 1964: WARREN COMMISSION REPORT RELEASED

The Warren Commission report on the assassination of President John F. Kennedy was released after a 10-month investigation, concluding that there was no conspiracy in the assassination, either domestic or international, and Lee Harvey Oswald, the alleged assassin, acted alone.

The presidential commission, headed by Supreme Court Chief Justice Earl Warren, also found Jack Ruby, the night club owner who murdered Oswald on live national television, had no prior contact with Oswald.

According to the report, the bullets that killed Kennedy and injured Texas Gov. John Connally were fired by Oswald in three shots from a rifle pointed out of a sixth-floor window in the Texas School Book Depository.

WEDNESDAY 1960: KENNEDY-NIXON DEBATE

For the first time in U.S. history, a debate between major party presidential candidates was televised.

The presidential hopefuls, John F. Kennedy, a Democratic senator from Massachusetts, and Richard M. Nixon, the vice president of the United States, met in a Chicago studio to discuss U.S. domestic matters.

Kennedy emerged the apparent winner from this first of four televised debates, partly because of his greater ease before the camera and because Nixon, unlike Kennedy, seemed nervous and declined to wear makeup.

FRIDAY 1994: ESTONIA SINKS

On this day in 1994, 852 people died in one of the worst maritime disasters of the century when the Estonia, a large car-and-passenger ferry, sank in the Baltic Sea.

The German-built ship was traveling on an overnight cruise from Tallinn, the capital city of Estonia, to Stockholm, Sweden, when it sank off the coast of Finland.

Estonia, a former Soviet republic that gained its independence in 1991 (the last Russian troops left in 1994), was a popular and affordable travel destination for Swedes.

Comedy troupe performs on Family Day

By Monica Castro
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Comedy City cast members burst into the K-State Student Union Ballroom at the sound of a whistle.

They acted as vendors to audience members, selling candy, kisses and other objects.

Comedy City, a comedy troupe from Kansas City, Mo., performed at the Union Program Council's dinner theater Friday night. The performance started the Family Day weekend at K-State.

The members of the Comedy City cast competed in a series of comedy sports. The referee, Trish Sinkhorn, opened the games by introducing herself and saying comedy sports were activities that allowed interaction between the cast members and the audience. The cast members feed off the audience's responses.

"I'm wearing stripes for two reasons — one, they give me power, and two, it's slimming," Sinkhorn said.

Sinkhorn also introduced the audience to the brown-bag foul. A foul occurred when people said something rude or offensive, and then they had to wear a brown bag on their heads for the remainder of the scene.

The two teams were the Blue Jets and the Red Sharks. Both teams played a game in which they pantomimed an item selected by the audience.

Later, they played other games that used song lines and performed "Cinderella" with different emotions that audience members selected. At the end of each game, the team that received the loudest applause earned points.

The night of laughter ended as the Blue Jets won the comedy sports battle.

Union Program Council Arts Committee Co-chairs Caitlin Burns and Hannah McSpadden helped plan the event. They said they chose Comedy City for the annual dinner theater because they thought it would be fun and interactive for the families.

"Since it is an improv group, they are interactive with you, and you are a part of the entertainment," McSpadden, sophomore in animal science and industry, said. "Their shows are never the same because they feed off the audience."

UPC had used Comedy City for other events and used them again this year because they make the audience engage with the performance, and it is appropriate for kids, said Beth Bailey, K-State Student Union assistant director and UPC program manager.

Clay Morgan, Comedy City cast member, said it was exciting to perform because everyone looked ready to have a good time. Morgan said since it was his first performance at K-State, it was fun and he thought everyone had a good time.

"Everybody has been so friendly to us, and we were received warmly," Morgan said.

Grace Kim, freshman in biology, said she thought the show was random. Kim said cast members' facial expressions and body movement made the show interesting because they were committed to their characters.

"It was very impressive how they came up with some things right on the spot," Kim said.

Brian Saddler, sophomore in horticulture, said he enjoyed the creativity of the cast throughout the show and it was neat to hear all the weird ideas the audience came up with for the cast to perform.

"I expected the randomness to come from the cast and not the audience," Saddler said.

Community members learn Cuban cuisine in UFM class

By Kristin Hodges
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Spices and oils lined tables as Manhattan residents chopped, sliced and ate the night away during the Miami Cuban Heat class Friday night.

The scene looked more like a picnic, but the cooking class is part of the UFM Friday night series. The classes are open to all and vary each week, and they are meant to be a cheaper alternative to the traditional dinner and a movie, said David Espenosa, class instructor.

"It's really nice to have new people," he said. "We get a new group every time. It's a nice mixture of different age groups."

Eleven students crowded around tables to listen for instructions from Espenosa. The six menu items for the night included meat-filled empanadas and arepas, and cornmeal pancakes.

Before the cooking began, the class volunteered to chop, knead and stir the different ingredients.

The first recipe was for Papa Hemingway Daiquiris. Class members sipped their beverages while continuing with the rest of the night's cooking.

Barbara Pearson, psychologist at K-State Counseling Services, said the class volunteered to help with the preparation.

"Everyone has pitched in and helped, and I think that's the fun part of this," she said.

Pearson said cooking is her hobby and a creative outlet. She said she has taken other cooking classes, but the Cuban class was more interactive than others had been.

"You know these recipes are recipes that are simple to come home from work and make," she said. "They look good and taste good, too."

The evening went smoothly until the cornmeal pancakes were made. First the blender leaked the recipe's ingredients, and then the first few creations burned. However, Espenosa assured the class the residue left on the grill added seasoning to the pancakes. "You are never supposed to eat the first ones — it's bad luck," he said. "The first ones are doorstops."

The six recipes were finished in just less than three hours with little time left for the class members to load up the food in containers to take home.

Espenosa encouraged them to "not be shy" when they filled their plates, and he told the class to not be afraid to try the recipes at home.

With the mess left over, some joked about who would do the dishes. However, several volunteered and cleaned the kitchen for Espenosa.

Dixie Curtis, Manhattan resident, is a regular UFM class attendee. She helped wash the dishes while talking about the enjoyment of taking the classes.

"I've taken a few," she said. "It's just a great thing to do with my free time."

Curtis said the classes give her different meal ideas.

"The good thing about them is they teach you how to use ingredients that you may not know how to use," she said.

Espenosa said he has taught other classes, though the recipes are always different. In the past he has taught students to make tamales, tortillas and tapas.

"I have a lot of influence from my family," he said.

He said the recipes used are Cuban and Spanish family recipes. He also uses recipes that are versions of things he has cooked at restaurants.

He said the recipes are not too complex, and the classes are always hands-on.

"I've learned they want to learn how to cook, not just watch me cook," he said.

Besides teaching UFM classes, Espenosa owns a catering business that is named after his mother.

HIT OR MISS | The editorial board selects Hit or Miss topics and writes them after a majority vote. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

HIT | THIS WEEKEND'S AGGIEFEST

With more than 90 bands, the third-annual music festival was bigger this year than it ever has been, and the timing for it was perfect since it was on a weekend with no football game.

MISS | POSTPONED LANDON LECTURES

Both Afghan President Hamid Karzai and Chinese Ambassador H.E. Zhou Wenzhong were unable to come to K-State for their scheduled lectures, and neither have rescheduled yet.

HIT | VISUAL IMPACT ARTIST AT FAMILY DAY

Richard Hight painted two pieces and performed choreographed dances at the same time. His talent brought something new to this year's Family Day.

MISS | O.J. SIMPSON

With this latest run-in with the law – Simpson has been charged with 10 felonies, including kidnapping and coercion with a deadly weapon – it seems that Simpson is striving to gain negative publicity for the rest of his life.

HIT | FALL BREAK

The upcoming three-day weekend will be a great time to take a brief break from classes, relax with family and friends, and cheer on the Cats as they travel to Austin to face the Texas Longhorns.

MISS | LACK OF FALL WEATHER

Autumn is the time of year when everyone can pull sweaters, scarves, boots and hoodies out of the back of the closet and enjoy the crisp, cool air. Fall started Sunday, but this week, we'll see temperatures in the 70s and 80s.

Uncommon ground

U.S. leaders unable to find moments of peace with enemy nations

Common ground is hard to find these days. No matter if it is a relationship, a friendship or on the world stage, finding someone with similar ideas and views can be difficult.

But there are some topics that everyone agrees on. One of these topics is the horror of Sept. 11, 2001. After that Tuesday, the United States had an entire world of allies. Not only were they past and current friends, but some were also past enemies.

Former Iran President Mohammed Khatami condemned the attacks, and cooperated with the United States when we liberated Afghanistan. Fast forward six years. The world, the United States and Iran are much different.

Last week, Iran's current president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, requested he be allowed to "pay his respects" to the victims of the Sept. 11 attacks during his trip this week to New York City to visit the U.N.

General Assembly. He was hoping, or so he says, to visit Ground Zero – where the World Trade Center once stood – but things took a turn for the worse.

According to CNN on Sept. 19, Ahmadinejad was denied the privilege of visiting Ground Zero.

A police spokesman said it was because construction at the site is ongoing, and it would be hazardous for the outspoken leader to be near it. But we can see past this explanation.

In the West, Ahmadinejad might be the most-hated person in the world, even described by some as a madman. It is understandable President Bush does not have him over to the White House for celery and peanut butter, but why deny him a chance to mourn what the rest of the world has mourned?

Perhaps it would not look good on the United States' résumé to try and blame terrorism on a leader and his country, while at the same time that leader is mourning victims of terrorism.

Ahmadinejad's predecessor mourned with us after Sept. 11, which was some common ground between us and Iran. It appears maybe the Iranian president would like to find more common ground too.

Former President Richard Nixon was able to find some common ground with communist China in 1972, and Israel and Egypt learned how to play nice, so it is not hard to think we could do this again with Iran.

Of course, most political leaders have come out against Ahmadinejad's visit. Mitt Romney called it "shockingly audacious," Hillary Clinton said it was unacceptable, and so on, according to CNN.

There is one institution, however, who sees hope where others see madness.

According to a report in USA Today on Sept. 21, Columbia University said it has no plans to call off a speech Ahmadinejad is set to give this week on its campus. The city council speaker said the university was allowing a "hate-mongering vitriol."

But Columbia has stood its ground and is showing us that perhaps we should allow our enemies to converse with us, even if it is a one-way conversation. According to USA Today, New York Mayor Michael Bloomberg – while saying he disapproved of Columbia's decision – said the college was free to invite whomever it chooses.

Ahmadinejad might be crazy, and he probably is pursuing nuclear weapons in an attempt to destroy Israel, but we will never know until it is either too late, or we allow some dialogue between both sides. This method of indirect diplomacy has failed miserably.

It is sad mourning the Sept. 11 attacks could be the common ground the world needs to right itself. But it is common ground we have not found elsewhere. And besides, if there is any group best-equipped to get lippy with a crazy authority figure, aren't they college students?

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

The Collegian welcomes your letters to the editor. They can be submitted by e-mail to letters@pub.ksu.edu, or in person to Kedzie 116. Please include your full name, year in school and major. Letters should be limited to 250 words. All submitted letters might be edited for length and clarity.

People should try to learn about other groups' cultures

As the old phrase goes, "sticks and stones can break my bones, but words can never hurt me." Growing up in Wellington, Kan., we must have run out of sticks and stones, because words were the only ammo in town.

Being raised in a multicultural household, my parents taught me well. I knew to respect my elders and to study hard. Yet, one thing I was not taught enough about was the hateful world we live in. I was never prepared for the kids who bullied me at my predominately upper-class, white elementary school. Even after years of confusion and bad words thrust in my face, I still did not know how to handle racism.

Some might argue the United States has moved beyond racism, citing a number of events like the abolition of slavery and the Civil Rights Act of 1964. Even with these successes, problems with diversity are still prevalent – even here at K-State.

K-State has tried to address diversity in a number of ways: through lectures, diversity advocates and funding for minority groups. No matter how much glitter you toss on our purple pride, it will always remain purple, but with a bunch of gunk caked on top.

This university invests a lot of money to give people the appearance of an all-inclusive environment. Take K-State's recruitment page, www.consider.k-state.edu, for example, where a person will find the face of a minority student on nearly every page. Not to call our administrators crazy, but this campus is hardly diverse.

According to the Registrar's Office, of the 23,141 students enrolled at K-State in 2006, 3,741 of those were minority students – only 16 percent. And of those students, 1,047 were international students.

In 2003, Student Senate tried to remedy the situation through a Diversity Programming Committee, which allocates $150,000 toward large-scale events designed to enhance diversity on campus.

While serving as president of the Vietnamese Student Association, my group was one of the groups lucky enough to use this money for our annual New Year's celebration, Tet.

Our club of approximately 15 members received nearly $15,000 for our celebration, and we worked hard to craft a brilliant show. However, no more than 30 students came to celebrate with us (though a good portion of the Manhattan community did instead). Ironically, no member of Student Senate, aside from myself, attended.

No matter how much money K-State tosses at curbing problems with diversity, it is the education about diversity that sets us back.

Diversity is a scary concept. Diversity is all around us. It is important that we take these opportunities to learn about cultural experiences different than our own.

We need to choose our actions wisely, and more importantly, the words we use around others. The United States is considered the melting pot of the world, fusing a mix of different cultures, races and religions. We better soak up as much of it as we can before time runs out and the contents of the pot begin to burn.

Buzenberg focused on wrong issues

Editor,

I find it funny that "serious investigative journalism" means nothing more to Bill Buzenberg than simply lobbing bombs at conservatives. In his Sept. 20 speech, Buzenberg says the U.S. is "creating a shadow government where corporations are starting to control many aspects of government." Funny, how we never hear stories like this when Bill Clinton is receiving campaign donations in exchange for missile technology or when he set up the Lincoln bedroom as a glorified travel-lodge for campaign contributors. Instead, all we get is "evil NSA wiretaps" and "Bush is becoming a dictator." Buzenberg should wake up to the reality of the actual dictatorship being set up on our doorstep in the guise of "because it's good for you." Things like smoking bans, fast food bans and other "dangerous" behavior that comes down to personal choice. Not to mention the disgusting over-extension, in recent years of, eminent domain and the hideous, liberty trampling McCain-Feingold Bill. People like him can't see past their hatred and rage for two seconds to differentiate the actual bad things going down. Try taking a peak at Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid's shady land deals or the campaign contributions of money bundler Norman Hue.

Linux should be considered also

Editor,

For lack of a better way to buffer my lectures, I have taken to reading the Collegian, and I usually enjoy the occasional "battle" columns. However, the last story left out the simple fact that there is a choice superior to both Mac and Windows – Linux. Linux can be installed on any functional computer, thus eliminating any debates about price, design or limited choices. Furthermore, it is entirely free, so no $100-$200 added on for Mac or Windows software. Linux uses completely free programs whose files are fully compatible with Windows and OS X; and if you really needed a Windows program, a program called Wine Doors allows most Windows programs to be run on a Linux machine. As for features, Linux allows its user to have up to 32 different desktops to switch between them at a whim, and put four of those desktops onto a cube. The cube can then be rotated in three dimensions for some staggering visual effects. Also, everyone who has used my Linux machine at home has commented on Linux's relative ease of use.

Linux's best feature is that it comes in many different varieties to fit user's needs. Want visual effects? Try Sabayon Linux. Like Windows Media Center? Try LinuxMCE. Like Internet security? You need Devil Linux. There is a version of Linux to suit everyone. Now while I realize the "battle" idea was conceived as a simple cat vs. dog debate, I think it ill-advised to rule out the potential benefits of a penguin – the universal symbol for Linux.

C-SPAN visit a nonpartisan event

Editor,

The Collegian news article on Sept. 20, "K-State Obama supporters to be on TV" by Emily Sterk is a story that suffers from a minimal amount of research and sources. The article is a free front-page advertisement for Barack Obama. Sterk only seemed to contact Students for Obama and the Young Democrats, two groups with strong ties to each other.

The C-SPAN Campaign 2008 tour bus is coming to K-State on Thursday from noon until 4 p.m. as a non-partisan event. The Collegian reported C-SPAN was specifically coming to speak to the Young Democrats and Students for Obama, which is false. The C-SPAN bus covers all candidates and will give tours to other student groups, including SGA and the College Republicans. Prior to the article, C-SPAN contacted the College Republicans to invite them to tour the bus. Not only will the College Republicans be filmed for television, but C-SPAN also will interview campus grassroots leaders for Sam Brownback, Rudy Giuliani and Ron Paul. The Collegian did a disservice to its readers by not covering each side of this event.

Students welcome soldiers at fort

Editor,

In my 30 years of reporting K-State news, only a handful of events have moved me emotionally. One was last night in Hangar 727 at Fort Riley's Marshall Air Field. A hundred K-State students joined the wives, children, parents and grandparents awaiting the arrival of Company B of the 1st Battalion 34th Armor from the Iraq war. As the 165 soldiers dressed in combat uniforms marched into the hangar single file shortly after 10 p.m., the crowd's screaming and clapping drowned out the welcoming ceremony officer speaking at the podium.

The K-Staters from Delta Delta Delta and Alpha Delta Pi sororities waved hand-drawn signs praising individual soldiers as returning heroes. The post's family support group had given our students names of soldiers who would have no family in attendance. The company commander released the formation. Immediately, the rush of the crowd to greet and hug each other was as charged as when K-State fans stormed the football field after defeating Texas last year. The students held their welcome signs and called out their soldiers' names. They found each other and exchanged greetings. The women presented bags and paper plates of home-baked cookies along with greeting cards signed by Manhattan school children. As quickly as it began, the event was over. The troops were anxious to get home and get on with life. Yet, the soldiers would get another sample of K-State hospitality. A few days ago, the K-State students decorated the company's barracks with streamers and signs. A veteran of the Vietnam era, I am enormously proud of these soldiers and proud of our students.

Chipman leads K-State to win

STAFF REPORT

Kelsey Chipman is making a habit of setting season highs in Boulder, Colo.

The sophomore middle blocker led the K-State volleyball team to victory against Colorado on Saturday, finishing with a season-high 16 kills and 11 blocks. Last season against the Buffaloes, Chipman amassed a season-high 20 kills and 15 blocks.

The No. 16 Wildcats (11-3, 3-1 Big 12 Conference) beat the Buffaloes (5-6, 0-3) in five games (30-24, 24-30, 27-30, 30-27, 15-12) to win their first match at Colorado since 2003.

Junior outside hitter Rita Liliom led K-State in kills with 18 as the Wildcats rallied from a 2-1 deficit.

The Wildcats finished with 72 kills in the match on .197 hitting.

Senior libero Angie Las-tra recorded her 23rd career match of 20 or more digs, as she totaled 20 in the match. As a team, the Wildcats totaled 58 digs.

Junior outside hitter Nataly Korobkova led the Wildcats in aces, finishing with four. The Russian native also tallied 12 kills on 45 attacks.

Senior middle blocker Megan Farr finished with a season-high 15 kills on .394 hitting. Farr's .393 season hitting percentage continues to lead the Wildcats. Farr also recorded eight blocks.

Senior libero Lauren Rosenthal also had a season high, finishing with 12 digs.

After the teams split the first two games, the Buffaloes closed game three on a 5-2 run to win 30-27.

K-State knotted the match with a 30-27 win in game four, then overcame a five-point deficit to take game five. Chipman recorded the winning kill, which came on senior setter Stacey Spiegelberg's season-high 62nd assist.

Colorado is now 0-5 in five-game matches, including all three Big 12 Conference matches.

Alex Buth led the Buffaloes, tying her career-high with 21 kills on .486 hitting.

The Wildcats' next action will be against Missouri at 7 p.m. Wednesday at Ahearn Field House.

MEN'S GOLF

Next golf tourney to be at home

The K-State men's golf team will have home-course advantage on its side at the Jim Colbert Intercollegiate, beginning today at Colbert Hills Golf Course.

Ten teams will compete in the two-day tournament, which begins with 36 holes today and concludes with 18 on Tuesday.

The tournament will be in Manhattan for the first time since 2003 and the fifth time since Colbert Hills opened in 2000.

K-State never has finishing worse than third in the Colbert Intercollegiate. It won the tournament in 2001 with a team score of 902, led by Aaron Watkins' 1-under par 215. Watkins is the only Wildcat to win an individual title at the Colbert Intercollegiate.

The tournament consists of three rounds, with the top four scores from each team counting toward the team total.

K-State will count on the contributions of freshman Kyle Smell, who posted the best score among the Wildcat golfers at last week's Kansas Invitational.

Smell, who played as an individual and did not contribute to the team score, jumped to the top of the leader board at the end of the first round with an even-72 and finished tied for eighth last week in Lawrence.

As a team, K-State entered the final round of the KU Invitational five strokes out of first place before slipping to fourth.

Chiefs grab 1st win of season

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Weapon No. 1 was shut down, so Kansas City turned to weapon No. 2 and nailed down its first victory since last New Year's Eve.

Damon Huard, giving up on getting any production from Larry Johnson, took to the air and hit rookie wide receiver Dwayne Bowe with a fourth-quarter touchdown pass and the Chiefs beat Minnesota 13-10 Sunday to avoid what would have been their second 0-3 start in 27 years.

Johnson, still chipping away rust following his 25-day holdout and dogged by a defense trained squarely on him, was held to 42 yards on 24 carries. At one point in the third quarter, the two-time Pro Bowler lost yardage on three consecutive carries against a Minnesota defense stacking eight and sometimes nine men in the box.

So the Chiefs turned to Pro Bowl tight end Tony Gonzalez and Bowe, their first-round draft pick last April, to fuel their only sustained drive of the day -- a 12-play, 84-yard march that ended when Bowe beat Cedric Griffin in the corner of the end zone for a 16-yard catch.

Rookie Adrian Peterson rushed for 102 yards and caught three passes for 48 yards for Minnesota (1-2) and scored the Vikings' only touchdown on an 11-yard run. The Vikings' "secret" starter at quarterback turned out to be, as most people suspected, the well-traveled Kelly Holcomb. Making his 22nd start of a 13-year career, Holcomb trotted onto the field after coach Brad Childress refused all week to disclose who would step in for the injured Tarvaris Jackson.

Oklahoma State quarterback Bobby Reid was the topic of a column by an Oklahoman sportswriter after being benched in favor of Zac Robinson. Reid's coach, Mike Gundy, defended Reid during a press conference following the Cowboys' 49-45 win over Texas Tech Saturday.

Tales from the DIGITAL AGE

YouTube broadcasts coach's outburst to world

It's become painfully clear that we've reached a place from which there is no retreat.

It didn't start with the Mark Mangino video, the one in which KU's head coach colorfully compares punt returner Raimond Pendleton to a processed food product.

And it won't end with Oklahoma State coach Mike Gundy's postgame tirade aimed at sportswriter Jenni Carlson, a columnist for the Oklahoman, an Oklahoma City daily newspaper.

AUSTIN

But somehow, sports and media and entertainment and the Internet have been rolled into one giant, muddy snowball that's steadily gaining momentum.

First, some background on Gundy's rant. It came after his team won what could end up being the best Big 12 Conference game we'll see all season, a 49-45 shootout against Texas Tech on Saturday. After emotionally charged games like that, it's typical for coaches to express a broad range of emotions, from elation to disbelief. But pure, unbridled rage? That's one we don't see every day.

Gundy made no mention of the breathtaking game that had just taken place. Instead, he stepped up to the podium, held up a copy of the Oklahoman and immediately launched into a 3 1/2-minute rant aimed at Carlson.

"Three-fourths of this is inaccurate," he said, holding up the Oklahoman sports page. "This is fiction. And this article embarrasses me to be involved in athletics."

The column in question dealt with the benching of Oklahoma State quarterback Bobby Reid. Carlson hinted that a lack of toughness landed Reid on the bench and suggested that Oklahoma State coaches were looking for a reason to replace their starting QB.

She supported her point with references to "rumors and rumblings" and "stories told on the sly," which tend to be poor substitutes for cold, hard facts.

That's what Gundy thought, anyway.

"That article had to have been written by a person that doesn't have a child," Gundy said as his voice rose to a shout, "and has never had a child that has had their heart broken and come home upset."

He continued: "(Reid) is respectful to the public, and he's a Team shakes off slow start at invitational

By Mike DeVader
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State women's tennis team got a rude awakening on the first day of the Hurricane Invitational in Tulsa, Okla., but rebounded to finish strong in the tournament.

Though the Wildcats were winless Friday, coach Steve Bietau said the results don't reflect the team's potential.

"We needed to try to bridge the gap between practice and live matches," Bietau said. "We are definitely not as bad as the first day showed."

Katerina Kudlackova and freshman Antea Huljev fell 8-2 to the 25th-ranked pairing of Maryori Franco and Nanar Airapetian, and Viviana Yrureta and Natasha Vieira fell 8-3 to the 57th-ranked tandem of Ela Kaluder and Aurelija Miseviciute.

K-State's Pauline Gue-mas was paired with Delia Damaschin of Arkansas, but the pair fell to Julie Westfall and Jie Zeng of Tulsa, 8-4.

The Wildcats were unable to turn their luck around in singles play, as the five singles matches all ended in losses.

K-State got back on track Saturday as Vieira and Yrureta both won their singles matches to advance in the consolation bracket.

In doubles play, Kudlackova and Huljev secured K-State's first doubles win of the fall campaign with an 8-6 triumph over Rebecca Row and Alexandra Kichoutkin of Tulsa.

Bietau said he was pleased with the effort of his team on the second day of the invitational.

"I thought our attitudes were exceptional, especially with some of the tough match-ups we received in this tournament," Bietau said. "Our toughest struggles showed some of our most promising results."

The Wildcats accumulated two doubles victories and three singles wins on Sunday, the final day of competition.

Kudlackova and Huljev finished their first weekend as a doubles pair with a 2-1 record. Yrureta and Vieira picked up their first doubles win of the fall campaign

Three K-State students spent their summers by the strip in Las Vegas gaining real-world experience through internships for a government agency.

Brian Hanson, instructor in engineering extension, said K-State offers students internships at the Radiation and Indoor Environments National Laboratory in Las Vegas through the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency.

He said the K-State Engineering Extension replied to a request for proposals from the EPA, and last summer the university received a grant and sent the first three student interns.

"The Engineering Extension has been working with EPA on a number of issues for several years," he said. "This is just another component, and it helps strengthen the ties."

According to the K-State Engineering and Extension Web site, the purpose of the program is to increase the number of students seeking environmental professions and to provide them with practical experience.

Hanson said each intern is assigned a full-time project, and the internships are available for students with a variety of majors, including psychology, communications and engineering.

Connor Whitney, junior in chemical engineering, was one of the first three interns with the program.

He said his project was to find a way for the radon-level information on the EPA database to be accessible through a graphical interface.

Whitney said the EPA employees were available if he needed help on his projects, but he liked that there was a lot of freedom with the internship.

"I really enjoyed it," he said. "The people were just amazing there, and I learned a lot."

While he enjoyed the project and the experience, Whitney said the work he did is not what he would like to continue doing professionally.

He said he liked Las Vegas and living in the residence halls at the University of Nevada, Las Vegas.

Kathryn Blackburn, senior in human resource management and psychology, had a project focusing on the EPA's community outreach and had several tasks, including acting as a photojournalist for many of the laboratory's activities.

Blackburn said she liked the location of the internship.

"We all lived at the university, and we were really close to the strip," she said. "It was just an overall great summer, and it was with two guys that I would have otherwise never met."

The third intern, Joseph Humphrey, senior in mechanical engineering, said he enjoyed his project, which involved developing a procedure to determine the amount of radium-226 in soil and waste samples.

"The people in Las Vegas and the support staff were helpful in making sure our wants were met, as well as the wants of the laboratory," he said.

Hanson said K-State recruits the interns after the EPA sends the projects that are available. The paid positions are full time and are mostly for the summer, but there are some available in the spring.

He said the program possibly will last five years if the money is still available through the grant.

IT'S ALL IN THE FAMILY

K-State's 79th-annual Family Day took place Saturday across campus and Manhattan. Union Program Council's Entertainment Committee helped plan the day's events, which included the Visual Impact artist, a Konza Prairie self-guided hike and tours of the K-State Challenge Course.

The day provided K-State students with the opportunity to share different aspects and features of the university with their parents, siblings and other family members.

Bassist Travis Tennyson and lead vocalist Charlie Roberts of Surphace play a set during their performance Saturday evening at Rusty's Otherside as part of AggieFest.

Surphace plays festival between recordings

By Brandon McAtee
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Charlie Roberts has been playing guitar and singing since age seven. He started writing songs at age 12 and started his first band in seventh grade.

Roberts is now deep in his project Surphace, a hard-hitting alternative rock band, with influences like Mike Patton.

The Wichita-based band played at Rusty's Last Chance during AggieFest.

Roberts said he thinks playing in Manhattan is almost like home.

"We have played up here the past few years, and I have a lot of guys from Cheney who live up here and like the band," Roberts said.

"So whenever the band plays here, they bring a lot of people."

Roberts said he also enjoys playing in towns with such a large college population.

"I think about the whole college scene, and it's the most important thing for doing what we are doing to get a large fan base," he said. "Especially with AggieFest and bands all day."

Surphace has one full-length album out, and the band is working on a second album and is not without its share of trouble.

"All the other albums I played all the instruments, and this one, it has been hard to get perfect as I have just been a bit out of practice on some things," Roberts said. "It has also been really hard to get together with the guy who recorded it, only meeting about once a week."

Roberts said the next step is to release the album.

"Then we are going to take a bit of a breather in November or December," he said, "and come back after that with a lot of shows."

Music lovers flocked to Aggieville over the weekend to watch more than 90 band performances at various bars in Aggieville, including a performance by The Appleseed Cast at the KatHouse.

Lawrence group headlines list of AggieFest bands

By Adrienne DeWeese
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

At the top of the list of more than 90 musical acts stood one name from 85 miles down the interstate that played its first performance in Manhattan — The Appleseed Cast.

The Appleseed Cast, an indie emo rock quartet from Lawrence, closed AggieFest with its performance Saturday at the KatHouse. Drummer Aaron Coker said he had seen the list of performances scheduled for AggieFest and thought it was crazy that The Appleseed Cast topped the list.

"That's really pretty awesome for that many bands for us to be at the top," Coker said. "It's never happened to us before, so it's kind of weird."

The Cast played a one-hour set, complete with an encore and several five-minute instrumentals. Band members include Coker, singer/guitarist Christopher Crisci, guitarist Aaron Pillar and bassist Marc Young. The band has undergone many member changes and additions since its formation in 1997, with Coker as the latest addition.

The band's influences are eclectic, and tastes differ among members, Coker said. While bands like Led Zeppelin and Tool are just two of the several favorites for the band, Coker said it is difficult to pinpoint influential bands that comprise Appleseed's sound.

"I think that's what makes us sound different from other bands," he said.

Lawrence shows for the band differ from shows in towns like Manhattan because band members have a wide fan base and many friends in Lawrence, Coker said.

"It was a really good surprise that so many people knew Appleseed songs and stuck around," Coker said of Saturday's show.

Festivals like AggieFest give towns like Manhattan the opportunity to attract more national touring acts, Coker said.

"I think it helps the chances of a town that doesn't get a lot of touring acts," he said. "People will have a chance to go out and do something besides drink."

Kula Voyage, a Manhattan band, plays at the KatHouse on Friday evening as part of AggieFest. The festival featured 92 local bands in nine venues.

Kula Voyage uses reggae sounds to perform covers

The smooth reggae sounds of Kula Voyage, a local band led by Adam Monroe, filled the KatHouse early Friday at AggieFest.

One of the first shows of the weekend, the band had to be patient as the kinks got worked out of the sound system.

Nobody expected the first concert to start without any problems, and the show finally started around 6.

The warm-ups before the show were disorganized, and I thought the band members were trying to play their set. Once the music was rolling, they sounded nothing like the warm-ups. They sounded amazing.

Adam Monroe, lead singer and guitarist, had a voice that complemented the music played behind him.

There were two guitarists on stage that worked together well. The electric guitar players were good about not stepping on each other's toes.

The most amusing part of the stage show was the sight of keyboard player Justin Gomez wearing a short-sleeve button-down shirt that was unbuttoned, leaving his chest exposed to the audience.

Listening to the music, audience members were unable to hear the saxophone player who was playing very quietly on the side of the stage. Once I noticed he was there, I tried to listen to him but could not hear a note he played.

If one bad thing had to be said about the show, it is they did not play much original music and had a set list of mainly covers.

When the guys played Sublime's "Badfish," the crowd responded well, and a few attendees made their way down to the front to dance.

Overall, Kula Voyage put on a very good show.

Their sound was tight, clear and very energetic. The lyrics were used almost as a filler as the band jammed from song to song. Next time they play, I will be there.

Liars of Local Interests' Ben Schardein, lead vocalist and guitarist, and Sarah Barron, violinist, perform for a crowd of about 60 people at the KatHouse on Saturday evening.

Liars of Local Interest rock with multi-genre sounds, violinist in KatHouse Saturday

A five-member band of self-proclaimed "broken-down-acoustic-rock-folk-alternative-country-type goodness" rocked the KatHouse during AggieFest last weekend.

Liars of Local Interests' sound, inspired by the Shins, Wilco and Blind Melon, is aesthetic and different because of Sarah Barron on the violin, said Ben Schardein, lead vocalist and acoustic guitarist.

"She brings a lot of class to the group," Schardein said.

The range of Barron's fiddling was impressive even to the untrained ear. Elegant double stops and unique flexibility of tone demonstrated intense dynamics in every song.

Schardein's vocals also added to the special sound of the band. The relatively high pitch of his voice melded well with the edgy acoustic rock that permeated the venue.

The members of the band have years of musical experience under their belts, and this was evident in their performance.

The level of musicality was high in their harmonious, upbeat songs. Schardein said the band has learned not to take themselves too seriously which helps them make good music.

The crowd of about 60 people was moved by the band's high energy. People moved to the music and hummed along to melodies, though there were a few enthused dancers in the crowd.

AggieFest was an opportunity for local bands to be heard by crowds that might not normally experience their music. Exposure at festivals for bands like Liars of Local Interest will bring them a new fan base and opportunities to spread their sound.

"I wanted to be famous by now and I guess if it won't happen, this is the perfect town to not be famous in," said Schardein. "Manhattan's local music scene is pretty amazing for such a small community."

Unknown rock group surprises

Take the steely blues guitar sound from Stevie Ray Vaughn, match it with the rhythmic bass and drumming of Golden Earring and you get the Terry Quitt Band and one heck of a show.

The crowd at KatHouse, consisting of mostly people waiting for later bands, was treated to quite a surprise and quickly got into the show, making for a fantastic atmosphere.

The place erupted as the lead singer, Terry Quitt, held some of the notes for what seemed like minutes in their cover of Pink Floyd's "Have a Cigar."

The band put its own twist on a crowd favorite when they covered Bob Dylan's "All Along the Watchtower." Starting the song in a cool, calm Dylan style, the candle-lit room was reminiscent of MTV's Unplugged set. As the song progressed, the band showed its true colors as it broke out the electrifying guitar sounds made popular by Jimi Hendrix's version of the classic.

Overall it was an amazing show and would have been well worth the outrageous cover charge had it lasted more than 45 minutes. It is unfortunate not many saw them because of their 8 p.m. time slot.

The band is hoping to get more dates scheduled here in Manhattan.

If they do, I recommend this show to any rock-'n'-roll fan.

to achieve them."

The 10-member, Texas-based Mariachi Campanas de America also will perform at the Encuentro. The group's performance will offer cultural awareness and is open to all students, said Uriel Estrada, H.A.L.O. president and senior in pre-professional secondary education.

"Some students may have never heard a mariachi band, so we're opening it up to all students," he said.

Students from universities and high schools across the Midwest will attend the Encuentro, including Fort Hays State University, Washburn University, Great Bend High School and Missouri State University.

"It's such an accomplishment for a university to put on such an event," Estrada said. "I want everyone to go home that day and feel like they've learned something."

Hispanic Heritage Month

events at K-State start today and will continue until Oct. 15. The events will provide an atmosphere reminiscent of home for some students. Mendoza, who lived in Mexico City until age 11, said the events, food and music will remind him of his hometown, where his grandparents still live.

"This makes you feel like you have a month of home," Mendoza said. "It's going to feel like home."

The month's celebrations also will offer several discussion groups for students. Tanya González, assistant professor of English, will facilitate a discussion about ABC's TV show "Ugly Betty" on Wednesday.

The 40-minute presentation will feature an analysis about Betty and the show's contradictory messages about empowerment and beauty, González said. González is working on a book about Latina subjectivity in popular culture and literature.

"My analysis is going to talk about why that's a problem with Latinas because traditionally they've been typed as a motherly figure who'll help you with whatever you need," she said. "We're going to talk about Betty as a type by bringing together a feminist reading of Betty and why intervention is needed in pop culture."

González said students and faculty members also are working with the DOW Multicultural Resource Center to start a movie series for Hispanic Heritage Month. The movie series would feature four movies about immigration with discussion opportunities afterward, González said.

Students of all ethnic backgrounds have the opportunity to experience different Hispanic traditions during the Hispanic Heritage Month events, Estrada said.

"They'll be able to interact with a little piece of our culture," he said. "I encourage students to come out and learn more about us."

not 21.

"All the music in one spot is a great experience," Smith said. "People are more excited about it, but not being 21 really sucks, because the bands I bought the ticket for are playing after 10, and I can't go into the bars."

Smith said venues could do different things to help younger people have a good time.

"I think individual bars could give a separate wrist band specifically for students who want to see a certain band," Smith said.

David Schultz, senior in elementary education, said he had friends in a band that performed. He said he thought the organizers of AggieFest picked a great weekend because it did not conflict with football. He said he would like to see AggieFest become even bigger.

"I think the best way to get students out to AggieFest is having a big-name band play at midnight," Schultz said. "Not only will more students come, but it would bring more people out to see local bands."

Going places other than the bars to hear great music was a highlight for Brittany, senior in criminology. She said her favorite spot was The Dusty Bookshelf because it was low-key.

"It is a fun place to hang out, and it is just good music," Kuykendall said.

She said the venues were packed with students at night, but she thinks students should come during the day because the bands are just as talented.

"The purpose of AggieFest is to hear great local talent and leave knowing Manhattan has a great music scene," Kuykendall said.

work with and has worked especially hard on the trade front to protect U.S. agriculture interests in the Doha round negotiations, while also working hard to reopen the Japanese and Korean markets to U.S. beef," Roberts said. "I wish him well."

"Chuck Conner is well versed in agriculture policy, and I am confident he will do well as acting secretary."

With his most recent project, Johannes has been working on the current farm bill by being host to listening sessions around the country. Conner accompanied Johannes during these listening sessions, hearing the likes and dislikes of the current farm policy voiced by U.S. farmers and stakeholders, according to Feedstuffs, a weekly newspaper for agribusiness.

Because of Conner's display of interest, many Republicans, including Roberts, agree Conner will be able to successfully fill Johannes' shoes. According to Feedstuffs, Conner has been working to reform the farm policy and plans to continue that process.

Aruna Michie, associate professor of political science, said she thinks Johannes' resignation was inevitable at this stage of the Bush presidency.

"The only comment I could make right now is that it's not surprising," Michie said. "This late into the Bush presidency people are looking for opportunities in the afterlife so to speak, so I'm not surprised."

brown strokes first forming the eagle's outstretched wings. Hight slowed his performance at times to focus on details like the eagle's talons and facial expressions.

Hight held chalk in each hand and stretched his arms to finish the border and edges of the canvas. When a piece of chalk became too short, Hight threw it behind his back and into the audience.

Hight said it is the response of audience members when he finishes that keeps him motivated to continue his art.

"All I'm doing is sharing the gift I have," he said. "Some artists paint behind closed doors and pray to God someone sees it and buys it. I'm just doing what I love in front of the public."

While Hight said he can draw any scene, he prefers to keep his artwork generic in settings like Saturday's Family Day.

"My audience tells me what to draw with the reason of the event and the purpose of the gathering," Hight said. "I think I have more in common with the folks on Family Day since I'm a family man myself."

Hight said he has seen men — including U.S. soldiers — cry while he created patriotic artworks.

"You touch a chord with them even though they're top-notch soldiers," he said.

While he also uses paint in his performances, Hight said he prefers to use chalk out of courtesy when creating artwork with live musicians. Hight said he spends thousands of dollars each year on supplies — he only buys the best in chalk.

Hight also gives keynote speeches called "The Masterpiece in You." He said he draws a picture and tells audiences members about making positive life choices to bring out the best in themselves.

Amanda Stanford, Union Program Council Entertainment Committee co-chair, said UPC members selected Hight since his performance is different from traditional art performances.

"We wanted to do something during the day that people could walk by and stop by and see," said Stanford, senior in psychology. "We wanted to do something attention grabbing. It was a really beautiful thing to watch and inspirational. It's not something you would see everyday."

While incorporating different performances into events like Family Day is a risk, Stanford said she was excited at the positive response that Hight received from audience members.

"I think it's great to see that people appreciated it and that it meant something to them," Stanford said. "It's always hard, especially for Family Day, to pick something that the whole family would enjoy, not just the college student."

Stanford said UPC members will try to bring Hight back to K-State in the future. Meanwhile, Hight's pieces from Saturday will be sealed with hairspray and put on display in a to-be-determined location at the K-State Student Union.

Pauline Kennedy, freshman in anthropology, said she saw Hight's painting while walking near the Bosco Student Plaza and decided to stop and watch. Kennedy said she could watch Hight create art all day long.

"It's amazing how random lines turned into a painting," she said. "He had such an imagination about it."

Kennedy also said she wished Hight would perform at Family Day every year.

"It's something that everyone can connect to in their own way," she said. "To see something spur-of-the-moment like that is just amazing."

COLUMN | YouTube makes events more public good kid. And he's not a professional athlete, and he doesn't deserve to be kicked when he's down."

Around here, we know a thing or two about making people mad with columns. But I've never seen a piece of journalism provoke the kind of sheer rage Gundy displayed at that press conference.

That said, colorful outbursts are not exactly uncommon in the world of sports. But thanks to the wonders of YouTube, casual fans and sportswriters desperate for story ideas can see and hear everything as if they were there in person.

And that's what makes this snowball so sticky.

Nothing is quite as simple as it used to be. We see sports figures from new angles, whether they're chewing out a player on the sideline or berating a journalist at a press conference.

It's not all bad. It eliminates some of the distance that once separated athletes and fans. It makes us think. It creates a broader sense of accountability.

In Carlson's case, perhaps it will serve as a wake-up call for journalists who settle for rumors instead of digging for facts.

Not that anything like that would ever happen around here, mind you.

But like everything else in this digital age, it's not a clear-cut, black-and-white issue. Even if Carlson's column wasn't Pulitzer-worthy, she didn't deserve this.

Carlson and I both grew up in Clay Center, Kan., and her brother and I were in the same graduating class in high school. I can't help but wonder how her father, a basketball coach himself, feels when he watches this YouTube clip.

I've never met Carlson and have followed her career only from a distance. But landing a job as a columnist is no small accomplishment, particularly for a woman.

It's not that women are any less talented or less suited for the job as a sportswriter. But there was a time in the not-so-distant past when women were not allowed in male locker rooms, and consequently, not usually considered for top-notch sportswriting jobs. It's quite possible that female sportswriters have to work harder than their male counterparts to get the same level of respect.

But thanks to Gundy's rant and its place in the YouTube library, no one will think about Jenni Carlson's accomplishments. From now on, she'll be the girl in the Internet clip.

So what's our final conclusion? Is the world a better place because a coach's tirade is just a click away? Or would it be better to keep some things out of the public eye?

These are the things we ponder in the digital age. If you're reaching the end of this column and searching for some kind of conclusion, well, you're out of luck.

All we can say for sure is that this snowball is getting muddier by the minute.

Sunday.

In singles action, Huljev earned her first win as a Wildcat with a straight-set win over Emily Arkell (6-0, 6-0).

Guemas also won her first singles match as a Wildcat, defeating Corrine Langston of Oral Roberts (6-1, 6-2). Yrureta finished her weekend with a 2-1 singles record, as she defeated Yawna Allen of Oklahoma State (6-4, 6-3).

After his team bounced back from the poor start, Bietau said only time will tell how good his Wildcats will be in the fall season.

"We played well at the end, but as of right now I think we are somewhere between how we played on Friday and how we played the rest of the weekend," Bietau said.

With the first tournament in the books, Bietau said consistency is one of the team's biggest concerns heading into the next tournament, Oct. 5-7 at the Hoosier Classic in Bloomington, Ind.

"The players will have to start seeing that we need to stop the unforced errors," Bietau said.

"Those mistakes will start going away as we play more matches."

Man charged with theft

By Willow Williamson
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A man's wallet, containing his and his mother's credit cards, was stolen last Saturday, and Sunday, a man was caught using the credit cards at a local pool hall.

John William Clark Jr. was charged with forgery, criminal use of a financial card, seven counts of theft of services and two counts of possession of stolen property, according to Capt. Brad Schoen, Riley County Police Department spokesman.

Clark allegedly stole Dustin Blackburn's wallet after Blackburn, 25, had returned from the bars to his residence, Schoen said.

According to reports, Blackburn told police he did not remember returning from the bars, but Blackburn said his friends told him it was some time around midnight. He said when he woke up Sunday morning, he could not find his jeans or his wallet.

Blackburn's wallet held his own credit cards as well as one belonging to his mother, Janet Blackburn, Manhattan resident, Schoen said.

Janet Blackburn said an acquaintance called her and said someone was using her card and signing her name at Fast Eddy's, a pool hall in Aggieville.

Janet Blackburn notified the police at this time, and they met her at the pool hall, Schoen said.

The police entered the building, where they found Clark, who matched the description given to Janet Blackburn, according to reports. Clark's bail was set at $50,000, Schoen said.

Allegedly, Clark had used Janet Blackburn's credit card at various locations throughout Manhattan. The total amount stolen is not yet known, Schoen said.

Engineering company to provide scholarships

By Adrienne DeWeese
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A worldwide leading company in GPS navigation and communication had representatives on campus as part of its scholarship initiative program with K-State.

Olathe, Kan.-based Garmin International Inc. had a Garmin Jeep and other equipment on display in the engineering plaza. Min Kao, Garmin president and CEO, selected K-State as one of the few universities in the country to receive the Garmin Electrical and Computer Engineering Educational Initiative. The initiative, funded through the Kao Family Foundation, will provide 16 students with $6,000 each year for electrical and computer engineering scholarships in K-State's College of Engineering.

Scholarship recipients also will receive first consideration for Garmin paid internships, which include housing and health insurance. The total package is about $20,000 per year for each recipient.

Kao began a $10 million endowment in the greater Kansas City region to recruit and retain electrical and

Gallery a part of Hispanic Heritage Month

By Kristin Hodges
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The dominant, wide eyes of a young woman stare at passersby and invite them to take a peek into her neighborhood and understand the tale told through photographs.

Betty, a 22-year-old Puerto Rican, is one of the faces in the collection of black-and-white photographs on display in the William T. Kemper Gallery in the K-State Student Union.

A selection of Régina Monfort's "Beyond Grand Street, Brooklyn, N.Y." photo documentary is on display in the gallery in celebration of Hispanic Heritage Month.

Monfort said the exhibit's title signifies that the first image was taken one block past Grand Street in Brooklyn, N.Y. The street is the dividing line between the Italians and Polish and the Puerto Ricans and Dominicans.

"The importance of telling a story is that you can open people's eyes," she said. "It's a cultural understanding."

Monfort said she began taking the photographs in late 1994, when the nine-year project began. The photographs focus on Puerto Rican and Dominican teenagers in the Latin community in Brooklyn's Williamsburg section.

In Monfort's text at the exhibit, the community is described as "another world where youth face the challenge of growing up without the benefit of the area's progressive gentrification."

Régina Monfort's photo documentary is displayed in celebration of Hispanic Heritage Month.

"My photos are about reality, and reality is more often sad than happy," she said. "What I was interested in showing was the reality of Williamsburg — the innocence — and to show that tenderness can co-exist with conflict."

A CELEBRATION

Uriel Estrada, senior in secondary education, is president of Hispanic American Leadership Organization, one of the co-sponsors for Hispanic Heritage Month.

He said the exhibit is something all students should see.

"It's definitely an eye opener for what we don't see," he said. "We know about it, but we don't see it. It's definitely given us a different viewpoint of some of the struggles that these teenagers may be facing."

He said the photographs give viewers a different perspective about the poverty in the area.

"From standing here and looking at these photographs, I can see myself in these images," he said. "It's about placing yourself in someone else's shoes."

Beth Bailey, assistant director of the Union, said Monfort wanted an opportunity to show her exhibit at K-State two years ago, but the schedule of events was already full.

Bailey said she gave the idea to

T-shirt campaign returns for 2nd year

By Sarah Burford
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Buy a shirt. Save a breast.

The K-State chapter of the Tough Enough to Wear Pink Breast Cancer Awareness Campaign will have its second-annual T-shirt sale to raise money for the Mid-Kansas Affiliate of the Susan G. Komen Breast Cancer Foundation.

Each T-shirt says "Tough Enough to Wear Pink" on the front, similar to last year's shirts.

This year, the designers changed the T-shirt color to dark pink and the slogan on the back to "Save the Ta Ta's," a popular phrase among breast-cancer survivors and supporters.

A breast-cancer awareness ribbon and Powercat accompany the slogan on the back of the shirts.

Kindra Gradert, senior in animal sciences and industry, designed this year's T-shirts with the intent of tweaking last year's theme a bit.

Gradert's mom suggested "Save the Ta Ta's" after she saw the slogan on a bumper sticker.

"The social conservative in me said, 'There is no way I'm putting that on a T-shirt,'" Gradert said.

But Gradert said she decided on the slogan after all, concluding it was a "fun and catchy little phrase that will work for everybody."

Gradert is the second vice president of Sigma Alpha, an agricultural professional sorority.

Sigma Alpha teamed up with K-State's Collegiate Cattlewomen for the "Tough Enough to Wear Pink" campaign.

Crystal Young, senior in agricultural communications and journalism and animal sciences and industry is the chair of K-State's campaign.

Young, member of Collegiate Cattlewomen, said Wrangler is the founder of the national "Tough Enough to Wear Pink" campaign.

"It's normally associated with rodeos, but I thought it would be a great way for students to get involved in a really great cause too," Young said. "That's why I wanted to bring it to campus."

Campaign members will sell T-shirts today and Wednesday at the K-State Student Union. Shirts cost $10, and all profits go to the Susan G. Komen Foundation.

Young said the campaign sold out of its 1,400 shirts and raised $7,500 last year, and she said they expect to raise $8,000 and sell 1,600 shirts this year.

Adam Hatesohl, junior in animal sciences and industry, said he pre-ordered a T-shirt last year through his fraternity to show support for breast cancer research, and especially in memory of his grandmother who died of breast cancer.

He said he liked the T-shirt designs for both last year and this year.

"I think they've done a very good job," Hatesohl said. "Last year's was good, and this year's is probably even better."

Young said no one in her family has had breast cancer, but she wanted to begin this campaign at K-State in support of those families who have been affected by it.

"I've seen moms, friends' moms who had it," Young said. "It ends up affecting somebody in some way, shape or form."

Strecker-Nelson gallery exhibit faces ideas of illusion, realism

Christopher Hanewinkel | COLLEGIAN

"The Illusion of Reality" exhibit in the Strecker-Nelson Art Gallery brings together 10 regional artists and contains different media like paintings, sculptures, ceramics and wood sculptures. The exhibit will run until Nov. 3.

By Mark Wampler
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

By definition, the opposite of reality would be illusion, yet reality is an illusion itself, a painter said.

Steven Graber is an artist and co-curator of the new Strecker-Nelson Art Gallery exhibit, "The Illusion of Reality."

"There is no block-solid, absolute entity that is reality," Graber said. "The wording is kind of a fun mind game."

The Illusion of Reality exhibit brings together 10 regional artists and contains different media like paintings, sculptures, ceramics and wood sculptures.

Jay Nelson, president of the art gallery, and Graber selected the works with the painting type of realism in mind. Graber said he and Nelson were struck by the fact that realism has to do with individual concepts and is not easily defined.

"We don't really see the world this way," Nelson said about a painting done by Graber. "But his reality is that," Nelson said as he gestured toward the piece.

Louis Copt, a painter from Lawrence, whose oil paintings of Spain and France are featured in the exhibit, said the show invites viewers into the works' mysteries and makes them ask questions.

"The work takes you to another place in time," Copt said. "Who are these people? What sorts of lives might they have lived? Here is something that looks one way, but when you look deeper is something else."

"This one is called 'Toy Box,'" Nelson said, pointing to carved wooden figures in a toolbox, a piece by Bob Holcombe of Manhattan.

"A hundred people have a Milwaukee right-angle drill box in their garage in Manhattan probably," Nelson said. "But he sees the possibility of making a piece of art out of it. He's seeing his world and its art."

Another aspect of the exhibit is the showcasing of regional artists, Graber said.

"I was really interested in having Kansas exposed to their works," he said, referring to two specific artists, Deborah Mae Broad and Michael Hamilton.

Graber said while Kansas is not exactly the center of the artistic universe, the pieces and the gallery are world class.

"The Strecker Gallery is one of the best-kept secrets of Kansas," Copt said. "This work could stand up anywhere, and it's in our own backyard."

Nelson said art helps people connect with what the artists see.

"Every artist is making a statement, and you get to share their vision of the world," Nelson said. "That's one of the great things about art. It gets you out of your own perspective and into somebody else's perspective."

The exhibit runs until Nov. 3 and also features works by Kris Kuksi, Yeqiang Wang, John Kudlacek, Stephanie Lanter and Caroline Kahler.

Manhattan deputy city manager accepts new job in hometown of Lawrence

By Scott Girard
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Most Manhattan residents do not like losing to Lawrence in anything, whether it be sports or city government. But the departure of one city manager to Lawrence will take place because of family, not rivalry.

Manhattan deputy manager Diane Stoddard is resigning from her position in Manhattan Oct. 17 to take the open position of Lawrence assistant manager.

Stoddard, a Lawrence resident and University of Kansas graduate, said her decision was based mostly on family. She said much of her family lives in Lawrence and she wanted to be closer to them.

"It was a very difficult decision because I've been here for 12 years," she said. "A lot of my decision was based on family."

Stoddard also said the job in Lawrence will provide her an with opportunity to advance her career in a new environment.

"Career-wise, it's a career-advancing move to help me move forward," she said. "They have their own challenges in Lawrence, and I like challenges."

She said though Manhattan and Lawrence have very similar city governments, she still should have beginner issues.

"It will be as similar as it can be," she said. "But even here, I never have the same job any day."

She said the two cities have almost identical structures, but she will have to re-familiarize herself with the Lawrence community and Lawrence city issues, which include significant budget deficits.

Stoddard also said she plans to keep a good relationship with Manhattan and hopes to expand the already strong relationship between the cities. She said the cities share knowledge and experience often.

"A lot of folks don't know it, but since I've been here, there have been at least three to four formal exchanges between the two cities," Stoddard said.

City manager Ron Fehr said Stoddard has been an important figure in much of Manhattan's growth for several years, and in many instances, has been given the ability to manage the city. Fehr said Stoddard was important to Manhattan's economic development and also several additions to the K-State campus, like the National Institute for Strategic Technology Acquisition and Commercialization at the K-State research park, which she helped bring to Manhattan to create several jobs and encourage economic growth.

Stoddard said her experience with economic expansion and a large university should help her in a community similar to Manhattan.

She does not expect to contribute heavily right away though.

"I think wherever you start a job like that, there's a great deal to learn and a great deal of people to meet," she said.

But Fehr said Stoddard should not have an issue adjusting to the Lawrence city management.

"Her overall management and economic skills are just two of many ways she'll contribute right away in Lawrence," he said.

Diane Stoddard, Manhattan deputy manager, will move to Lawrence to take an open position as Lawrence assistant manager Oct. 17.

Lyndsey Born
COLLEGIAN

Fehr said one of those other contributions is her community volunteerism. He said she was very involved with community efforts on her own time.

Stoddard took her first job in Manhattan as assistant to the city manager in March 1996, a post she held until April 2000, when she was promoted to assistant city manager. Stoddard was hired as deputy city manager in January 2005.

"In general, I've really liked the opportunities to work with citizens and community groups," she said. "This job has allowed me the chance to work with a lot of great citizens in Manhattan."

Fehr said he will spread out the duties of deputy city manager while city management conducts a national search to replace Stoddard.

"We owe it to the citizens to see who's the best available and get the best available option," he said.

Politicians should care more about people than campaign strategies

Mitt Romney must have severe memory loss, or maybe he is just an idiot.

While serving as governor of Massachusetts, Romney introduced a plan to provide health care for all Massachusetts citizens. This plan, which was passed in April 2006, required every person to pay for health insurance but helped those with yearly incomes of less than $50,000.

According to Romney's address made at a famed diner in New Hampshire, this program is funded by state and federal money normally used to provide health coverage at hospitals.

Hillary Clinton recently revealed a health care plan to cover all U.S. citizens. It would require all citizens to pay for insurance and assist those who could not afford health coverage. During an interview on CBS' "Early Show," Clinton said her plan would be funded by rolling back President Bush's tax cuts on the rich and federal savings in the health care system.

These two plans look similar on paper. People must have coverage, and the state will help pay for the coverage through government — state and federal — funds. Romney must have skipped that day in school when they taught comparing and contrasting.

Romney continues to denounce Clinton's plan, though Clinton even said she used Romney's plan as a model for her proposal.

Romney never goes long without mentioning his work in Massachusetts. He said, "One of the things I'm proud of doing in my state is putting on track a plan that gets everybody health insurance. And that in my opinion is one of the great things that had to happen."

During the aforementioned talk at the New Hampshire diner, Romney said he did not support Clinton because it involves the government by using tax money.

When asked how Massachusetts' plan was subsidized, Romney responded: "We took the money we had been using, federal, state and also money from our insurance companies, giving free care at hospitals, and said we'll help you buy private insurance instead."

Romney just does not want the tax cuts rolled back; he does not want to look any more like a Democrat than he does now.

There is one major difference between the two plans, however. Romney said in his New Hampshire dinner talk his plan allows citizens to choose from four private insurance companies, while Clinton said the following on her campaign Web site: "Americans can keep their existing coverage or access the same menu of quality private insurance options that their members of Congress receive."

Romney just does not like the idea of providing health care without benefiting the private insurance companies and creating unnecessary bureaucracies, and neither do the health care companies.

There is no question we need some form of universal health care. Most prosperous countries in the world have some type of universal health coverage, why not us — the most prosperous country?

According to many reports, 47 million people do not have insurance, and according to a Sept. 20, Time magazine article, one-third of those are people who can afford it and are healthy young people who do not want to pay for it or think they do not need it.

They do need it, but most cannot get it at the costs of today's health coverage. Prices are soaring through the roof and many cannot handle it, and even the government could have trouble supporting the system.

Massachusetts already is having trouble coming up with enough money to sustain the system. What would happen if that was extended to the whole United States?

Romney said the way to solve this problem is to let each state establish its own health care coverage system. For some reason I do not think that would work; people could drive 10 miles to a different state and be subject to totally different standards.

We need a national standard, and we need a way to finance this universal coverage system. Clinton's plan to roll back taxes for the rich is a start, but not much will change until private insurance companies warm up to the idea of helping people, instead of treating them as a piggy bank.

Collegian editors appreciate feedback

The Collegian Public Affairs Correspondents had a booth in the K-State Student Union last week.

The editors of the Collegian appreciate all the feedback we received — positive and negative.

The surveys and booth went well because of the reader response and suggestions. Members of the K-State community filled out more than 200 surveys, and after analyzing each comment, the results were distributed to all the editors as suggestions for their content.

The editors will use the comments appropriately and as they see fit for their specific content or coverage material.

The Collegian appreciates its readers' input because the purpose of the student-run publication is to inform students, community members and all readers alike.

We will be able to serve the needs and interests of students on campus by using your opinions and ideas constructively.

Based on the surveys, the editors and writers, will be able to improve the quality of the Collegian as well as cover events and stories of interest.

Many people who filled out surveys requested more diverse story coverage for less-known groups and organizations.

Anyone can submit press releases and story ideas to the Collegian. To assist the editors in diversifying coverage, e-mail specific story ideas to collegianpublicaffairs@gmail.com.

University codes infringe on freedom of speech rights

Since the 1980s and '90s, campus speech codes have been used to check free speech at the door. Though these codes were designed to protect women and minorities, according to the Web site for "Indoctrinate U," a recent documentary on free speech on campuses explains how campuses claiming to have diversity are limiting the voices and ideas transmitted to students. Universities do this to prevent unrest on college campuses across the country.

The first public viewing of "Indoctrinate U" is set for Sept. 28, in Washington, D.C., and people everywhere should reflect on the important message this documentary carries.

The film is sure to incite debate and controversy on university campuses nationwide, and for good reason. Political correctness has invaded colleges to the extent that it threatens the very nature of independent thought, specifically, conservative ideology.

The Foundation for Individual Rights and Education released findings of a survey in a report on Dec. 6, 2006, showing that of 229 public universities, 225 had adopted some speech code that hindered the right to free speech of students on those campuses.

The University of Delaware Library published a document containing the university's thoughts on Freedom of Expression and Campus Speech Codes. The report stated, "A college or university sets a perilous course if it seeks to differentiate between high-value and low-value speech or to choose which groups are to be protected by curbing the speech of others."

Rather than saying universities are repressing speech, schools across the country justify speech codes in the hope they will end harassment.

With colleges promoting exceedingly liberal agendas, conservatives have become the counter-culture fighting for a right to speak.

Recently, Columbia University extended an invitation to Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad to give a speech after addressing the U.N. General Assembly. According to University President Lee Bollinger, it is important to have opposing views expressed on college campuses. Bollinger even went as far as to say theoretically the university would invite Hitler.

Now rewind to Oct. 4, 2006, when Jim Gilchrist, founder of the Minutemen Project, attempted to present a speech at Columbia University. His speech was cut short by the "Chicano Caucus" and other groups that climbed on stage to disrupt his speech.

The Associated Press reported on Sept. 19, Columbia University's Columbia Political Union had scheduled Gilchrist to revisit the campus and speak in a forum. However, his invitation was withdrawn after the university was consulted by student groups and individuals on campus who felt "strongly" against the speaker coming.

This is one of many examples of how institutions favor liberal dogma. Many universities promote diversity of population but not diversity of thought or disagreement. Furthermore, those colleges that do support the First Amendment are being inundated by complaints from certain student organizations who disagree with conservative beliefs, wanting action to be taken to censor opposing beliefs.

Every citizen should understand freedom of speech has implications, like dissent, which might offend people at times but is still necessary.

Justice Robert Jackson wrote in 1943, "[F]reedom to differ is not limited to things that do not matter much. That would be a mere shadow of freedom. The test of its substance is the right to differ as to things that touch the heart of the existing order."

Universities must not limit the freedom of a student's right to speak freely, because without the ability to debate issues of contention, we will surely not learn nor benefit from the institution.

Sorority uses pregnancy suit to raise money for local agency

By Adrianne DeWeese
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Students can put down $1 this week to vote to see one of five prominent K-State male students spend a day in a pregnancy suit.

Zeta Phi Beta sorority will have a fundraiser and philanthropy to support Life Choice Ministries through Friday.

Participants can vote for one of five men with significant campus leadership roles to wear a seven-month pregnancy suit next week on campus, said Corazon Ochanda, Zeta Phi Beta president and junior in nutritional sciences. The winner will wear the suit all day Oct. 3.

The five men are Matt Wagner, student body president and senior in management information systems; Nick Piper, Student Senate chairman and senior in finance; Bryon Williams, Black Student Union president and junior in economics; Terry Petrie, K-State football running back and senior in social sciences; and Jonathan Anderson, Phi Beta Sigma president and fifth-year student in architecture.

"We wanted a variety of guys who do a variety of things on campus," Ochanda said. "We went around and asked people who they wanted to see, and those were the names that came up."

Fifty percent of the funds will support Life Choice Ministries, and 50 percent will support Zeta Phi Beta because it is a nonprofit organization, Ochanda said.

Ochanda said Zeta Phi Beta often does its philanthropies with organizations that deal with pregnancy issues, like the March of Dimes, Crisis Center Inc. and Life Choice Ministries.

"We decided to put a twist on it and have men see if they would be willing to do it," she said. "The guys were pretty excited about it, surprisingly."

Ochanda said the fundraiser and philanthropy is an opportunity for men to learn more about issues that affect women like pregnancy.

"We do want them to keep in mind it's a fun community service project," she said.

"It's not meant to offend anyone. It's easy to get females involved in these kinds of things, but this is a way to bring in the guys."

Ochanda said the sorority members did not set a specific monetary goal and consider the event a trial-run fundraiser.

"If it goes well, we'll do it again next year, but we didn't set ourselves with any expectations," she said.

Gloria Conner, Zeta Phi Beta vice president, said about 40 people stopped at the K-State Student Union table Monday, and the group raised about $35. Conner, senior in personal financial planning, said people were impressed at the active aspect of the community-service fundraiser.

"Most people were intrigued at the community-service project instead of just asking for donations," she said. "People were amused at the thought of seeing someone wearing a pregnancy suit."

Conner said the fundraiser is aimed at the Manhattan community as a whole.

"It's just a great opportunity for people to do community service in the Manhattan com-

CITY COMMISSION

$39M development on work session agenda

By Nicholas Birdsong
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

City commissioners will discuss an estimated $39 million Manhattan development plan at a special work session tonight at 5 p.m. in City Hall.

The Quality of Life 2 Committee will update the city officials on the project's progress, city officials said.

In November, residents will vote on the project, called the Quality of Life bond issue. Ballots will be mailed to all registered voters within the city limits, said Ron Fehr, Manhattan City Manager.

The final decision on the project is left up to the voters for legal reasons.

"Cities can't make certain types of improvements without the electorate," Fehr said. "Not only that, but with that type of financing - with sales tax - only voters can approve it for this use."

The money, if approved, will fund four different development projects across the city. Approximately $3.5 million of the funds will be used for renovating the Northview Pool. A soccer complex with four to six fields will be built with $1.5 million of the fund. Sunset Zoological Park will receive $3.5 million to construct additional facilities and expand services, according to the Quality of Life committee's Web site, www.qualityof-life2.org.

The largest funding component will be the Family Indoor Recreation and Aquatic Center; it will cost an estimated $31.7 million. According to the Web site, the center will provide citizens of all ages with year-round recreational opportunities like gyms, pools and walking and wellness facilities.

Feds announce largest steroid crackdown in U.S. history, make more than 120 arrests

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

PROVIDENCE, R.I. — Federal authorities announced the largest crackdown on illegal steroids in the nation's history Monday, arresting more than 120 people and raiding dozens of labs that manufactured growth hormone for sale on the black market.

Agents seized 56 labs, many of which were located in dirty basements, and recovered 11.4 million doses of steroids, according to the Drug Enforcement Administration.

"We were a little bit stunned at the amount of labs we found as a result of this investigation," DEA spokesman Garrison Courtney said in Washington. "It's not something that's on a scale that we've ever seen."

The announcement follows a growing number of scandals in the sports world over steroids, but authorities said the probe was focused on distributors, not users, and that no professional athletes were directly involved in the investigation.

U.S. investigators were helped by governments of nine other countries, including China, which is hosting the 2008 Olympics. Among those facing charges are a Chinese manufacturer accused of smuggling human growth hormone into the U.S. and others who allegedly got steroids from China and sold them to U.S. customers.

The probe, dubbed Operation Raw Deal, targeted manufacturers of raw materials needed to produce steroids, as well as underground steroid labs in the U.S., Canada and Mexico. Agents also investigated Web sites that offered kits to convert steroids from powder into injectable forms and Internet discussion boards frequented by bodybuilders.

"Even though their storefront is the Internet, rather than the street corner, the people who engage in the smuggling and distribution of these substances are drug dealers, plain and simple, and we will treat them accordingly," said Robert Clark Corrente, U.S. attorney for Rhode Island. Federal prosecutors in San Diego, New York, Houston, Kansas City and New Haven, Conn., made similar announcements.

The labs' customers could include high school athletes, bodybuilders and ordinary adults who simply want to look better, officials said.

"As we start to dig into this, I would have to believe that we're going to find customers who are in fact high school kids," said Steve Robertson, another DEA spokesman.

The DEA said 143 federal search warrants were issued during the 18-month investigation, many of them since Thursday. The FBI, Internal Revenue Service, U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement, and the Food and Drug Administration were also involved.

In New York, five people accused of operating illicit steroid labs known as "Bodiez by Design" and "Strong Island Underground" were indicted on charges of conspiracy to distribute a controlled substance.

In Connecticut, four men were charged with purchasing raw steroid powder from China, manufacturing steroids in home laboratories and distributing them to customers through a MySpace.com profile and a Web site.

And in Rhode Island, a Chinese corporation and its chief executive were indicted on federal charges of smuggling illegal human growth hormone into the U.S.

Gundy defends tirade

By Jeffrey Rake
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Mike Gundy was in no mood to back down from comments he made during his 3 1/2-minute tirade in the post-game press conference following Oklahoma State's 49-45 win over Texas Tech on Saturday.

Gundy

He didn't want to make any apologies, and he didn't care to retract anything either. He said he was only doing what he thought was right.

Gundy, however, did have just one regret.

"Wish I would have said more," he said.

During the Big 12 Conference's weekly teleconference Monday, Gundy re-emphasized his belief that student-athletes should be off limits when it comes to issues off the field.

That, he said, is why he took exception to a column written by the Oklahoman's Jenni Carlson, who questioned the character and toughness of Cowboys quarterback Bobby Reid in a story that ran Saturday.

The column, which the Oklahoman has stood behind, was the subject of Gundy's post-game rant.

"(I'm) tired of certain people downgrading college athletes who are good people," Gundy said. "If you want to comment on his play, comment on his play. But don't comment on something that's outside of his play that is downgrading or belittling to a young man who is trying to do things right."

Reid, the team's starting quarterback at the beginning of the season, was benched prior to Oklahoma State's game against Troy on Sept. 14. He did not play on Saturday against Texas Tech and is expected to remain in the back-up role when his team plays Sam Houston State this weekend.

In her column, Carlson questioned whether or not Reid would be willing to put forth the effort in trying to regain his starting spot.

"Does he have the fire in his belly?" she wrote.

Though Gundy did not get into the specifics of the column, which he claimed was three-fourths untrue, he did say he's fed up with the way the media treat student-athletes.

Other coaches seem to agree with his sentiments. Gundy said he has received several supportive e-mails since the incident.

"I've been bombed with them," Gundy said.

Oklahoma coach Bob Stoops defended Gundy during Monday's teleconference, and said he agreed with the coach's assessment of the media.

"The problem with us is these are - regardless of what anyone wants to say - student athletes," Stoops said. "They're not professional players. They're just playing for their school, trying to do a good job."

Gundy did not answer any questions regarding the game in his post-game press conference. He said defending Reid was a higher priority.

"I thought it was more important that somebody stand up for the player who couldn't stand up for himself," Gundy said.

K-State linebacker Reggie Walker, who did not see the highlights of Gundy's post-game press conference, said he couldn't envision seeing coach Ron Prince pull off a similar stunt.

Still, he said he understood why Gundy did what he did, though he felt it could have been done in a different way.

"It was good that he stood up for his players, because a player wants to be respected by his coach," Walker said. "But I think he could have calmed down."

CROSS COUNTRY

Working her way

Beverly Ramos and fellow Puerto Rican Liliani Mendez compete in the Kansas dual meet earlier this month. The two runners placed first and second, respectively, in the event.

K-State sophomore transfer Beverly Ramos is one of two members of the cross country team from Puerto Rico. Ramos has won two meets this season.

Ramos' work ethic inspires team

By Wendy Haun
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Being members of the K-State cross country team is not the only thing Beverly Ramos and Liliani Mendez have in common. They are both from Puerto Rico.

"It's refreshing, especially since we both speak the language," Ramos said. "We get together and make dinner or native dishes together."

Ramos, sophomore transfer from Trujillo Alto, previously ran at the Universidad of Puerto Rico. She said Mendez, junior from Dorado, was one of the main reasons she came to K-State.

Ramos said she heard about the program after a former K-State runner and fellow Puerto Rican contacted her about the program. Coach Michael Smith said though he saw Ramos run in 2003 when she was only 16 years old, he didn't contact her until last year about transferring to K-State.

Ramos already has won two meets this season - first at the University of Kansas dual Sept. 7 in Manhattan, and again one week later at the Woody Greeno Invitational in Lincoln, Neb. Following her efforts in Nebraska, she was named Big 12 Runner of the Week and was the first Wildcat to win the honor since Mendez did on Sept. 27, 2006.

"She's elevated the training and the level of competition," Smith said. "She and Liliani together have brought a game level of competitiveness to our team. They're pretty close in ability."

Though Smith and Mendez both described Ramos as friendly and outgoing, they also agreed she leads by example.

"Beverly doesn't say much, she just runs," Smith said. "She and Liliani go out and run hard and practice hard together. Our other women look at how hard they work, and their work ethic has been contagious."

Mendez said Ramos is a hard worker.

"I think she's really focused and she knows what she wants," she said. "She's definitely guiding herself to reach her goals. I think she has that mentality of being the best every day."

Ramos, who transferred to K-State in January, trained all summer with the women's team. She said though the women don't know where they are on a national level, they think they are improving every week.

"My goal right now is to go to the NCAA Tournament," she said. "I don't know where we are competition-wise right now, but we are getting better. I think we can be there for sure."

K-State faces talented depth chart at Texas this weekend

By Wendy Haun
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Texas roster is loaded with blue-chip athletes at every position - however K-State coach Ron Prince said he was especially worried about the Big 12 Conference's leading rusher, Jamaal Charles. Charles, who has 85 rushing attempts for 471 yards and six touchdowns, is averaging 117 yards per game.

"He's a pro in every sense of the word," Prince said. "He's a dynamic runner. He has no problem catching the ball, blocking out of the backfield, those kinds of things."

"He's right now probably the most dynamic runner in the league and the kind of guy you can plan a game around, so I'm very concerned about him."

Prince also said Texas is not lacking in the passing game. The Longhorns are led by senior Limas Sweed, who has 15 receptions this season for 267 yards and three touchdowns. However, he is not the only threat in the receiving corps. Senior Nate Jones, who has 29 receptions for 285 yards and two touchdowns, and junior Quan Cosby, who has 26 receptions for 213 yards and a touchdown.

"Texas has two dynamic wide receivers that are not No. 4," Prince said. "There are two other young men who have emerged when it comes to receptions per game, the amount of yards and just dynamic plays that they are putting up. It makes it very very difficult."

MURPHY ADDS YARDS, CHARACTER TO TEAM

Prince said junior wide receiver Deon Murphy has added several elements to the team.

Murphy, who has 15 receptions for 163 yards and two touchdowns and also three rushes for 34 yards, is also No. 1 in the conference in punt returns. With 10 returns for 201 yards, he is averaging more than 20 yards per return. Prince said Murphy has stats like Yamon Figure's when he was at K-State.

"This player has a lot of confidence, and he wants to play well," Prince said. "I don't think it matters to him who he's playing against."

"I like the fact that he's got personality. I like fact that he wants to play and he wants to have fun with this. He's a lot of fun to be around."

However, while Murphy might be noticeable because of his personality, Prince has noticed something else impressive.

K-State's Jordy Nelson tries to run past Texas' Marcus Griffin in the Wildcats' 45-42 victory over the Longhorns Nov. 11, 2006, at Snyder Family Stadium.

"He's tough," he said. "He's willing to practice hard like we want people to practice. He's diligent and serious about what he's doing. He's focused on the game plan. I like that he brings some personality to the game."

Wildcats in 2nd place after 2 rounds at Colbert Intercollegiate at home course

By Mike DeVader
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A single word can describe the playing conditions of day one of the Jim Colbert Intercollegiate: Windy.

With two rounds complete, the Wildcats are in second place, eight strokes behind first-place Miami of Ohio. Marquette, Missouri

State and Akron round out the top five.

Coach Tim Norris said his team was ready for the environment of Colbert Hills, K-State's home course.

"There are hardly any calm days here," Norris said. "We weren't surprised that it was windy, and I thought our team handled it very well."

In individual play, sophomores Mitchell Gregson and Robert Streb both shot 2-over par, putting them in a tie for second.

Freshman Joe Ida shot 6-over and is tied for 11th place. Senior Kyle Yonke and freshman Kyle Smell, shot 8-over and 10-over, respectively.

Norris said he liked how his team battled, but he was also impressed with the play of Miami.

"A score of 287 is great," Norris said. "We can't play defense in golf, so we need to put another good day together tomorrow."

The day was not supposed to be as windy as it was, but the forecast for today projects more of the same, which concerns Norris.

"If the conditions are like this again, it's going to be tough," Norris said. "When the wind is from the north, it adds two or three shots to this course; but if our team fights like they did today, I think we will be just fine."

Day two of the Colbert Intercollegiate begins at 8:30 a.m. today with a shotgun start.

College of Engineering students build 'KS' letters in 1921, 1930

The giant "KS" and "Manhattan" letters displayed on hills in Manhattan greet residents and visitors every day. The letters have a long-running tradition with K-State students and members of the Manhattan community dating back to 1915. The following article, from the March 31, 1989, Collegian, discusses the history of the letters and the organizations that have helped keep their tradition.

HISTORY, TRADITION SURROUND LOCAL LANDMARKS

By Carol Knorr
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

They are subtle in a way, yet the whitewashed rocks that linger above Manhattan spelling the name of the city and "KS" have history.

The earliest record of consideration for such a structure's construction was in 1915, said Jeanne Mithen, librarian for Riley County Historical Society.

"In the April 17, 1915, issue of The Industrialist, the college paper at that time, it was stated that four classes of the College of Engineering were planning to build a 60-foot-wide by 75-foot-high 'K' on Prospect Hill," Mithen said.

But the "K" was not built until 1921, when the Civil Engineering Society planned the construction, she said.

According to the book, "Legacy: Engineering at Kansas State University," about 1,000 men worked on the project. Students were to be excused from classes at different times of the day to work on the "K" in an organized way.

"Apparently, it did not work out quite according to plan. Students met in Aggieville and marched to Prospect Hill led by a brass band," according to "Legacy."

The letter is 80 feet long, 60 feet wide, one foot deep and cost $350.

Despite hopes of engineering students, the "S" was not built until 1930 when Sigma Tau honorary engineering fraternity organized the project, according to a Collegian report.

"Working in a steady downpour of rain, 500 students built a $500 'S' in 1930 ... the project was student financed," according to "Legacy." "Raising the money became a major effort for engineers. The fraternity sponsored tag day, movies, boxing matches and promoted donations from everyone they could think of — faculty, businessmen and $125 from the Seminar treasury."

In 1937, Sigma Tau began a movement to acquire the title to the land but was not successful until the spring of 1946.

"In an all-school assembly on Oct. 16, 1947, the deed was presented to the college by Professor L.V. White, faculty adviser to Sigma Tau and consistent promoter of the project for 10 years," according to "Legacy."

In 1964, the members of Sigma Tau discussed the possibility of adding the letter "U" to the hill, but the estimated cost of $10,000 deterred the group, Mithen said.

While the engineers of K-State were busy creating the "KS," the local chapter of Kiwanis began constructing the "Manhattan" sign on Blue-mont Hill.

In 1927, 25 members of the club built the 30-foot-high letters for $128, said Leonard Fuller, Kiwanis secretary.

UNIVERSITY ARCHIVES

Four men help whitewash the "KS" letters circa 1980 on Prospect Point, formerly known as K-Hill. The engineering society Tau Beta Pi maintains the letters every fall.

Jay McGehe, a 50-year member, said the letters were a service project to identify Manhattan.

"It's up on the city property," McGehe said. "It is sort of an advertisement for the town."

Maintaining the letters is an ongoing project for Kiwanis. Every year they whitewash the letters, cut the grass and clean the hill.

The letters have been rebuilt a number of times, McGehe said. Because it is a community project, the city has co-operated by helping with the cost.

"I can attest to the fact that the letters must have been difficult to construct after helping with the whitewash process," Fuller said. "Unfortunately, in between whitewashes, vandals paint all over the letters."

Circle K International, a university group formed 15 years ago and sponsored by Kiwanis, has helped maintain the hill.

The letters on K-Hill have been maintained by a group affiliated with the original constructors, said Donald Rathbone, dean of engineering.

The Sigma Tau pledge class was responsible for whitewashing the letters until the late 1970s, Rathbone said. At that time, Sigma Tau lapsed and Tau Beta Pi took its place.

"The entire pledge class whitewashes the letters once a year during the fall semester," said Michael Armour, Tau Beta Pi president and junior in chemical engineering.

Engineers now expected to know field, be experienced in other areas

By Whitney Hodgins
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Students majoring in fields like engineering, computing science and technology management should know by now that potential employers expect them to overachieve.

Samuel Brinton, junior in nuclear engineering, wants to use his degree for more than researching and publishing information — only engineers can decipher — he wants that information to be helpful to people who didn't take classes like Matrix Theory and Analytic Geometry. That is why he belongs to 13 clubs on campus and has worked at mastering Russian, French, Japanese and — most recently — Spanish.

"The jobs that are missing in my field right now are the ones between the people and the engineers," Brinton said. "Engineers are known to just stay in their offices researching instead of getting that information to the public."

Brinton's work ethic is a positive one for students majoring in subjects related to engineering and computer science, especially those who want a job within those fields, according to an Aug. 30 article published in Business 2.0 magazine. The article addresses the revolutionized requirements for recent college graduates applying for a job at Google, eBay or Microsoft — three of the most popular tech companies still relevant to the post-dot-com generation.

"Since businesses today have to be able to react quickly to shifting market dynamics, they want more than engineers with high IQs and good college transcripts. They want people who can think on their feet," according to the "Business 2.0" article.

Brinton's busy schedule is exactly what employers want, according to the article.

"I worked hard to perfect my time schedule so I could do all of this," he said. "I get about 15 e-mails an hour from all of my classes, clubs and research inquiries. I wanted to find out how engineers act in different situations, as part of the public policy angle, and networking with my engineering peers is very important."

"Making the effort to build a résumé that stands out is old advice for most students, but technical skills aren't enough in today's high-tech environment," said Daniel Andresen, associate professor of computing and information sciences. "What I stress to my students is the need to be ambidextrous. We have a department of introverts, so we really emphasize becoming knowledgeable in a complementary field like chemistry, Chinese or biomimetics."

Andresen said the computing-science department recently cut 30 hours from the major's requirements so students could spend more time on an outside concentration.

"This will give them the opportunity to broaden their horizons," he said. "It's a lot easier for them to get a secondary major now. They need to get good at something other than computer science."

Graduates can look forward to a receptive job market also, said Julie Thornton, instructor of computing and information sciences.

"The number of these majors has decreased, while the number of job availability has increased, so it's a very good job market," Thornton said. "Computer-science majors from K-State are very well qualified. They've done a lot of program and team projects and have seen a lot of operating systems. I haven't heard of students having problems getting jobs after graduation."

Applicants look to local companies like Cerner, in Kansas City, Mo., which builds software for hospitals, and Garmin, which makes GPS devices, to get their foot in the door, Thornton said. Internet companies like Yahoo and Google hold applicants to higher standards.

The Business 2.0 article gives an idea of just how far applicant requirements have evolved, with a quote from the assistant director of Stanford University's Career Development Center, Beverly Principal.

"It used to be that if you could spell 'engineer,' you got a shot," Principal said. "Now there is much more concern about employees being able to work with the company and grow to the next level."

Union Program Council members again in the spring, and they decided to use the photographs for Hispanic Heritage Month – Sept. 15 to Oct. 15 – and Community Cultural Harmony Week, which was Sept. 17-21.

Ginny Pape, UPC graduate adviser, said the photographs are part of Monfort's larger exhibit.

"We wanted to do something that was multicultural," she said.

AN 'UNBELIEVABLE' NEIGHBORHOOD

Monfort said the people in the neighborhood were second-generation Puerto Ricans and Dominicans who are now U.S. citizens, though they value their heritage.

"They're very attached to their culture and their language, and it's a very beautiful thing," she said. "I realized they were living a really tough life."

"It is also infused with moments of joy and celebration, but some kids really fall through the cracks. I think it has a lot to do with the city and the quality of life in the neighborhood."

Jooyung Park, graduate student in family studies and human services, studied the pictures in the gallery.

Park said she came to K-State from Korea and was surprised to see the content in the photographs – specifically pointing to a picture of children playing with scraps of metal in a park with only dirt and shrubs and graffiti-covered buildings in the background.

"I thought everything in America was rich and good," she said.

Park said she has not been in the United States long, but she said it was "unbelievable" to see conditions like those in the country.

Park said she liked the photograph of the face of Betty because it was very natural.

A TALE

The photographs in the gallery focus on the life of Monica, a young woman in the neighborhood.

A tale is told through pictures of Monica with her family, pictures of her pregnancy, and then pictures of her funeral after she died from a bullet-wound to the head on New Year's. She was 19 years old.

"It was devastating because we were getting close," Monfort said. "She had called me asking me when I would come to see her. Obviously, one develops a relationship over a nine-year period."

In Monfort's text, she dedicated the exhibit "to people from around the way who have given me their trust, and to Monica who fought back whenever she faced a challenge. R.I.P., Monica."

Monfort said the youth in the community had to learn to be adults to survive. She said the details in her photographs like physical violence were not statements about the community but simple observations.

"I was showing what I see through the photographs," she said. "I was invited to come back, because in many ways they show I believe in their uniqueness of human beings, and the nature of their interaction, and more than anything I was convinced to show their story."

Monfort developed a relationship with several of the people in the neighborhood throughout the duration of her documentary.

computer engineering students.

Garmin officials will have a reception on campus in November for students interested in applying for scholarships. Scholarship students will be selected in spring 2008 and will receive their funding in fall 2008.

"It is our goal to attract and inspire Kansas State's finest electrical and computer engineering students," Kao said in a KSU Foundation press release. "Encouraging college students to pursue an engineering career will help ensure that our country remains competitive in an increasingly technological society."

Jeff Hall, Garmin design engineer, said the company's visit informed people Garmin does not make only GPS products. The company makes aviation-integrated flight systems, outdoor fitness products and marine products like fish finders, chart plotters and radar.

Garmin representatives also spoke with engineering classes about classroom material and how it applies in real-world engineering.

Hall, a 1998 graduate in electrical engineering, said the company tries to hire as many K-State graduates as possible.

"It's important to introduce people to the technology and to alleviate the financial burden that comes with attending college to make sure they get into the field they want to," Hall said of the Garmin Electrical and Computer Engineering Educational Initiative program. "K-State is selected because we have K-State graduates, and we know they're good."

Companies like Garmin also educate students about career opportunities. The College of Engineering has its own career fair in February, and companies come during the academic year to describe project information to various classes, said Tom Hollinberger, Career and Employment Services assistant director.

Hollinberger said events like Monday's are an opportunity for students to talk with professional engineers who are in the field.

"It really helps the students understand the profession they're about to get into," he said. "It helps motivate them to be successful in getting the degree, and it helps motivate them to get them in the right niche of the profession."

Garmin also offers students internship opportunities to apply their academic majors and minors.

Ryan Summerskill, senior in computer science, said he had an internship with Garmin this summer that allowed him to apply his minor in embedded systems.

Embedded systems, which comprises a significant part of Garmin's industry, deal with writing software that runs directly with the hardware, Summerskill said. He said the internship allowed him to experience an accelerated design phase in testing suites of avionics.

"They have a wide range of projects to work on so they're not just a GPS company from an engineering perspective," Summerskill said. "They have a wide range of technologies that you use that aren't seen from the outside."

While Summerskill is ineligible for the scholarships because he is graduating, he said they will continue to benefit K-State students.

"The more money you can get will always help the students," Summerskill said. "It also gives an instant connection to the student of a well-developing company."

WEEK OFF HELPFUL

With the bye week, the players had time to rectify problems and work on recovering from injuries. Prince said both junior cornerback Ray Cheatham and senior cornerback Bryan Baldwin were back in the rotation.

"We talked a lot about the rest versus rust issue," Prince said. "I think a lot of the players' bodies thought, 'Hey, we should be playing a game this weekend.' You try to figure out and make sense of it."

Junior linebacker Reggie Walker agreed with Prince.

"I like bye weeks because of the rest and everything, but it's pretty boring," he said. "We're not doing anything. Just practicing is boring. I wish we could have played."

'HALO 3' RELEASE

Waiting for morning

Apathetic gamers skip storyline

"Halo 3" is expected to sell 10 million copies in the first day of its release, according to the Los Angeles Times.

"Halo 3" advertisements are everywhere: TV, internet and Mountain Dew cans. Personal Computer gamers, Nintendo loyalists and Sony fanatics are wondering what the excitement is all about. Even some people who have played "Halo" are wondering why the series is so popular. The answer is not necessarily in the game play — but the story.

It's my suspicion that a majority of the people who have played "Halo" and aren't addicted to it simply hit the skip button through all the cut scenes or because they just want to blow up more bad guys. However, these short movie-style scenes are very important in a story-driven game like "Halo."

Playing the campaign mode of an action/adventure game without paying attention to the story is like watching a movie to observe skillful screenplay while placing no emphasis on the resolution of conflict.

With video games, it is possible to play through a game and enjoy it without knowing what is going on, but the addictive feeling of being immersed in a totally different world isn't present. This is why many people excited for the "Halo 3" release are the same people you could expect to enjoy movie trilogies like "Lord of the Rings."

There also are the multiplayer addicts: the gamers that love the competitive, online portion of the game that allows up to 16 players to duke it out.

If someone isn't into the story, but is still excited for "Halo 3," then this new game is definitely for the multiplayer made famous by the "Halo" predecessors.

Microsoft expects record-breaking sales

By Mike Kelly
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

For gamers across the globe, Christmas has come early.

Starting today, "Halo 3," the final chapter of Microsoft Corporation's video game trilogy, is available to the world for purchase in 37 countries and in 17 languages.

In the United States, Microsoft reported more than 10,000 retailers opened their doors early this morning solely to sell the new game, which Wired magazine called "a cultural touchstone, a Star Wars for the thumb-stick generation."

Developed by Bungie Studios, "Halo 3" was manufactured exclusively for the Xbox 360 system and the Xbox online community. The new edition of the series allows online users to save their favorite gaming moments, and use a map editor that allows an infinite level of customization options.

"With 'Halo 3,' Bungie Studios has further mastered the art of marrying fantastic gameplay with the intangibles that make the experience extraordinary for gamers, evoking incredible emotion through its story and character development," said Shane Kim, corporate vice president of Microsoft Game Studios.

"That emotion is at the heart of what makes this more than a game and why 'Halo' connects with its audience in the way other great stories like 'Star Wars' resonated with theirs," Kim said. "But unlike the static experiences of a great film or novel, 'Halo 3' offers a dynamic and social interactive entertainment experience that enables players to finish the fight themselves."

Despite its renowned video mapping and frame rate, many fans attribute Halo's success to the fact that it encompasses more than just a game.

"'Halo' is so much more than just sitting in front of a television," said Brian Rawlings, Wamego resident and Halo fan. "It's a story that you watch as well as play, so it feels like you are really part of the story."

Passing the time between the "Halo 2" tournament and the premiere of "Halo 3" at midnight, members of the tournament play a few games of "Halo 2" in the Hardback Cafe at Hasting's. There were about 15 people who participated in the tournament, the winner of which received a free copy of "Halo 3."

tion of today's release is the unfinished storyline left at the conclusion of "Halo 2." Questions linger as to the fate of the protagonist, Master Chief, and his artificial intelligence sidekick Contra, as they attempt to save the world from the alien group known as the Covenant. The new game contains more than 20 feature films, which include over 39,000 lines of dialogue, 13,000 sound effects, and music totaling over six hours of continuous play. GamePro online designated "Halo 3" as "the biggest video game in history."

Sales projections for "Halo 3" are higher than any video game in history. Its predecessor, "Halo 2," generated a record-setting $125 million in sales in the first 24 hours of its 2004 release. Three years later, it is still the most played game on Microsoft's Xbox Live online gaming network, with nearly 1 billion hours of online game play logged.

However, Microsoft plans to break these records by the close of today's business day. Microsoft reported that more than 1.5 million copies of "Halo 3" already have been sold, making this the fastest pre-selling game in history.

Excitement for the release began in 2004 and has remained consistent throughout the three-year waiting period. The fervent fan base, affectionately known in the gaming community as Halo Nation, posted more than 15,000 videos on youtube.com related to "Halo 3." The "Halo 3" multiplayer beta, an online trial session which ran for three weeks in May 2007, attracted more than 820,000 participants from 25 countries around the world, becoming the biggest console beta of all time.

"Halo 3" is available in three editions, ranging in suggested retail price from $60 to $130.

West's sound 'graduates' on 3rd album

Few musical artists polarize music fans as much as Kanye West. Love him or hate him, West has been a prolific artist producing beats and albums at an alarming rate since he emerged in the early aughts. Surely there are songs, beats and raps West has created you can appreciate for their technical proficiency.

I have followed West since his 2004 debut, "College Dropout." I fell in love with his helium-voiced soul samples, excellent beats and clumsy-yet-charming wordplay.

Then in 2005, West collaborated with Jon Brion and created the expansive masterpiece, "Late Registration." West upped the ante by expanding his repertoire to (almost) bloated proportions. Samples were used more creatively, guests were bigger and better, and West's flow improved substantially.

Now West continues his excellent run of albums with "Graduation," which shows West expanding his sonic palette even further with his new-found obsession with synthesizers and processed percussion, as well as merging his familiar soul pieces with samples from sources as varied as Steely Dan, Daft Punk and Can.

"Graduation" doesn't overload the brain's pleasure centers as much as "College Dropout" or "Late Registration," but it does prove to be his most innovative and consistent album yet.

The album begins with "Good Morning," an opening statement that slowly allows the listener to process West's new sound. West raps over clanking percussion, a thumping bass, spaced-out synthesizers and an excellently executed sample of Elton John's "Someone Saved My Life Tonight."

Perhaps the most talked-about track on the album is "Stronger," which finds West rapping over a chopped-up version of Daft Punk's "Harder, Better, Faster, Stronger."

When I first heard the song, I thought it was blasphemy for West to rip off and barely change Daft Punk's song, but after several listens, the subtleties in production began to reveal themselves. The thumping kick drum, processed snare hits and retro synthesizer lines help make the song distinct enough from the original, and West has won me over with his catchy chorus and multiple hooks.

"I Wonder" resembles West's earlier work, snagging a sample from the soulful tune "My Song" by Labi Siffre. After a beautiful introduction that uses the untouched song, West floods the sample by putting it at the bottom of a mix of pounding percussion, rumbling bass and soaring synth lines.

West is the type of artist who will rap over a sample of Can's "Sing Swan Song" with Mos Def ("Drunk and Hot Girls") and actually make it work. West is one of the few rappers who can utilize Coldplay's Chris Martin and make him sound soulful ("Homecoming"). West also is the type of artist who can be egotistical beyond comprehension and still create humble tracks like "Everything I Am" and "Big Brother," in which he examines his relationship with Jay-Z throughout his tenure at Roc-A-Fella records.

"Graduation" only has cemented my admiration for West. For those who have written him off in the past, "Graduation" might just make you reconsider your opinion of one of this decade's most influential artists.

Commission discusses bond issue

By Nicholas Birdsong
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Community members and city leaders discussed the $39 million Quality of Life 2 bond issue yesterday at the city commission's work session.

The Quality of Life 2 bond issue committee presented information on the project to the city commission.

"We recapped for the commission the status of the campaign," said Kent Glasscock, the co-chair for the committee. "We gave a presentation that delineates what the bond issue is, what the improvements are, the costs involved."

The presentation described construction and operating costs and also the justifications for the project, City Commissioner Bruce Snead said.

The committee's goal is to inform the city commission and the local citizens of Manhattan about the upcoming bond issue before November when the public will have the option to accept or reject the proposal, Glasscock said.

"I think elections are about informed choices," he said. "The committee's goal is to educate them about the issue, present the merits and costs, and let the constituents decide."

Specific information about the bond issue can be found on the committee's Web site, www.qualityoflife2.org.

Commissioners also discussed a potential ethics policy. Development of the policy will continue into 2008, Snead said.

Top: Cadet David Zeller, sophomore in history, is thrown over a rope tied to two trees during the ROTC Team Training lab Tuesday afternoon. The cadet team had to work like they were crossing over an electric fence. If anyone touched the rope, they had to take a 15-second penalty. Below: Members of a ROTC cadet team work together to turnover a tarp, called a poncho, without anyone falling off as part of a team-training event.

Cadets engage in teamwork activities across campus

By Monica Castro
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

ROTC squads ran across campus competing against the weather and terrain with one goal in mind — working together as a team.

Members congregated in front of Richard B. Myers Hall at 2:30 p.m. to get in their designated squads and were handed clues to different areas around campus that had challenge events.

Adriel Ruiz, freshman in pre-professional business administration, said he enjoyed competing in the events because he was able to learn squad teamwork.

"I liked the challenges because I was able to get to know my squad better and get closer to them," Ruiz said.

Amber Imel, cadet and senior in family studies and human services, said the team-building lab the ROTC members competed in was a way cadets learned how to work together. Imel said there are three different platoons, and within each platoon, there are three squads with about 10 members.

She said each squad went to nine different stations across campus and tried to win the challenge presented to them.

Before they could begin the tasks, squads were presented with a military trivia question, and if they got it correct, they could compete. Imel also said each squad had only 15 minutes to complete the challenge or they would receive a "no go" and have to move on.

One of the challenges included a mine maze that was located at the field south of the Veterinary Medicine Complex.

In this challenge, the squads had to get from one side to another of the boxed grid without stepping in a square with a mine. The facilitator would tell the squad member competing if there was a mine.

Imel said the purpose of the mine-maze challenge was to teach students how to command and learn how to listen to instruction.

The squads also competed in the poncho flip, which was located in front of the president's house. The squad had to flip over the poncho as a team without their bodies touching the ground.

Other courses included a relay race, completing 300 sit-ups and push-ups, and a course called electric fence.

Zachary Sheets, senior in life sciences and electric-fence facilitator, said electric-fence event participants had to get over the rope without touching it, which required a great deal of teamwork.

ROTC members participate in four team-building labs like Tuesday's each semester, Imel said. The events are mostly the same but are altered slightly each year, she said.

After all events were complete, the squads returned to the front of Myers Hall to hear the results of the team-building lab. The 1st Platoon 3rd Squad won and completed all nine challenges in one hour and 18 minutes. The squad received a streamer for its flag.

Jason Miller, cadet major in Battalion S3, said the streamer is significant because it is a recognition of a squad's top performance. Miller, senior in management, said he helped plan the events and thought it was a good opportunity for him to see this event go from paper to reality.

"It was a good experience for me to plan it, because I was able to see the events actually happen and saw how it could be improved," Miller said.

Miller, who has family in the Army and aspires to be in the Army, said he thought the event gave members a great opportunity to learn what the ROTC is about.

"This was a good chance for them to work as a team rather than individuals," Miller said.

Jason Grams, cadet captain, said these events were practical experiences in communication skills and teamwork building.

"Our job is to evaluate their leadership skills so we can get an idea of where they are and what they need to improve on," Grams, senior in agronomy, said.

Paul Bragg, freshman in chemistry, said the team-building lab was a revitalizing experience because of competing in the challenges.

"The challenges motivated me and made me feel like I wanted to go out there and achieve the extra mile," Bragg said.

Bragg said he came to K-State's ROTC program because he wanted to serve and protect his country.

He said he also wanted to continue the legacy of being the Army other members of his family have started.

"I joined the ROTC program to learn leadership, to become a better soldier and leader," Bragg said.

K-State, KU federal denied grant to benefit education of migrant children

By Whitney Hodgins
KANSAS STATE UNIVERSITY

K-State and the University of Kansas were denied a federal grant to fund the first year of college for children of migrant or seasonal farmers.

"KSU received a letter Aug. 15 advising the school their proposal was not being funded," said Gregg Wiggins, a public affairs officer for the U.S. Department of Education. "This is a competitive grant program, and not every applicant receives a grant."

Bob Fanning, assistant director of K-State's English as a Second Language program, said he hoped Kansas' ranking as seventh in the nation for the number of migrant and seasonal farm workers would have improved K-State's chances of receiving funding.

But the $2.1 million grant request K-State submitted, which would have lasted for five years and provided tuition for 148 students, was denied for reasons that are yet unknown, said Fanning, who also is the director of Project Destiny, a program that helps migrant workers' children finish high school.

The College Assistance Migrant Program is a federal grant from the U.S. Department of Education to fund the first year of college for children of migratory or seasonal farm-workers.

"K-State is the first land-grant university in the nation," Fanning said. "Because CAMP focuses on individuals who are provided seasonal and migrant farm work experience, it seemed like a perfect match between the intention of our school and CAMP's role in serving those kind of students."

Fanning said he requested an explanation from the U.S. Department of Education as to why K-State's proposal was rejected and will take those comments into consideration when redrafting the grant in time for the next deadline in February.

"I knew when we applied for the project we would be at a disadvantage," Fanning said. "It wasn't that we didn't have an excellent proposal, but the evaluation process of the applications automatically gives any school with previous CAMP experience more points than those without. I believe the reason we didn't get an award was likely due to limited federal funding in this area."

Qualifications for applicants were based on each state's per-pupil expenditure for education and the number of eligible migrant students, ages 3 to 21, residing within the state. Fanning said he knows at least 75 K-State students who would be eligible for the money.

JEFFS GUILTY ON BOTH COUNTS

ST. GEORGE, Utah — Polygamous sect leader Warren S. Jeffs received a guilty verdict for two counts of being an accomplice to rape.

Jeffs, leader of the Fundamentalist Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, blinked when the verdicts were read but showed no emotion. None of his followers in the courtroom reacted.

The 51-year-old was convicted of two counts of being an accomplice to rape related to a marriage he conducted in 2001 between Elissa Wall, who was 14, and Allen Steed, 19.

The first rape count occurred between April 23, 2001 — the day Jeffs conducted Wall's marriage — and May 12, 2001, when she and Steed took a trip to Canada to visit her sisters.

The second count occurred between May 13, 2001, and Sept. 30, 2003.

Sentencing is scheduled for Nov. 20 at 1:30 p.m. Asked if he wanted a pre-sentencing report completed, Jeffs answered that he would do what his attorneys advised.

A pre-sentencing report gives the judge further information about a defendant. Jeffs' attorneys requested the report and said they also would file a sentencing memorandum.

The three-member defense team walked out of the courtroom shortly after 2:30 p.m., and lead attorney Walter Bugden said only, "Of course we're disappointed."

A 5th District jury of five men and three women had deliberated about three hours today with a new member. One of the eight jurors was excused this morning for a reason that was not disclosed.

11,000 POUNDS OF POT SEIZED

Tucson, AZ — Nearly 11,000 pounds of marijuana — or 5 1/2 tons — were seized Saturday on the Northwest Side in what officials are calling one of the largest residential seizures in Tucson-area history.

The marijuana carries an estimated street value of $5.5 million, said Deputy County Sheriff's spokeswoman.

While authorities say the bust is one of the largest at a residence, they could not say exactly how it ranked without verifying that through records.

The Counter Narcotics Alliance, a multi-agency task force, discovered the marijuana in a home in the 1000 block of East Orange Grove Road, near North First Avenue, and in a vehicle, said Hanke.

Hanke gave the following account: The seizure came after a neighbor called to report a possible burglary in progress at the home shortly after midnight.

As deputies arrived, they saw and attempted to stop two vehicles — a van and a Nissan Titan — that were near the home, but the drivers refused to stop.

As the van drove away, it hit a median, and the driver got out and ran. That person had not been located late Saturday.

After spiking the tires of the Titan at Orange Grove and North La Cañada Drive, and again at Orange Grove and North La Cholla Boulevard, deputies were able to take three men from the truck into custody, though they also tried to run away.

WHITE DENIES SEX TAPE

A spokesperson for the White Stripes has told NME.com that the woman in the supposed "Meg White sex tape" that has been circulating around the Internet is definitely not the drummer.

The highly dubious porn clip appeared online with many blogs and Web sites rushing to the mistaken conclusion that it was the White Stripes.

However, confirming what NME.com suggested yesterday, White's U.K. label has moved to quash any speculation that it is her.

"We as a label believe some people have a very twisted sense of humor, and this prank is in particularly bad taste," a spokesperson said. "The tape circulating on the Internet as featuring Meg White is fake. It's definitely not Meg."

As previously reported, the real Meg White is suffering from acute anxiety, forcing the White Stripes to cancel all their tour dates this year.

Manhattan voters to use mail-in ballots to voice opinions about $39M bond

By Riley Zarda
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

For the first time in the city's history, voters registered in Manhattan will be able to stay at home and voice their opinion with mail-in ballots.

The issue on the mail-in ballots is whether to accept a 10-year, 1/4-cent retail sales tax that would fund a majority of the proposed $39.2 million Quality of Life 2 bond.

Anyone registered to vote in Manhattan by Oct. 5 will receive a ballot on Oct. 17. Ballots must be returned by Nov. 6.

"We are looking for a greater level of participation from the people," mayor Tom Phillips said. "Voters will determine the outcome. Every voice will count."

However, the new approach the city is using to obtain voters' opinions has not been accepted by everyone.

"Who sends the ballots in and tabulates them?" said Rose McBride, a registered voter of Manhattan for 10 years. "Who's to say that my vote will be counted?"

The bond will not be decided by the mail-in ballot, but instead determined by the city commission and city staff.

"There will be no public vote on the bond itself," Phillips said.

According to the city's Web site, the estimated costs of the four elements that compose the bond are: $31.7 million for an indoor recreation and aquatic center, $3.5 million for integration and improvements at Sunset Zoological Park, $2.5 million on expansion and repairs of the Northview Pool and a $1.5 million soccer complex.

"The current facilities are inadequate to meet the demand of the city," Phillips said.

Curt Loupe, director of Manhattan's Park and Recreation, said the bond will offer facilities to the community for more than 20 years and would provide benefits in the future of the city.

Loupe said the new facilities are expected to attract visitors who would bring in more business, consequently paying the proposed sales tax and assisting in paying for the bond.

"As sales grow, you raise how much sales tax you bring in," Loupe said. "In 2001 Manhattan had $600 million in retail sales. In 2006, we had $840 million and we have a projected $900 million for 2007."

The recreation and aquatic center will be open to all Manhattan residents but also will require a membership fee.

"There will be a range of membership options for the community," Phillips said. "There will be a balancing act in covering costs and making fees that are attractive to those in the community."

Remains reburied near Meadowlark Hills

By Amanda Keim
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A collection of hardware, traces of clothing, human remains, a few headstones worn with age and the Kansas wind are all that remain of a life lived long ago near Meadowlark Hills.

On Sept. 14, 13 sets of human remains found in 2004 were returned to their resting place at Meadowlark Hills, a Manhattan retirement community, during a traditional reburial and rededication ceremony.

Professional archaeologists under the direction of Donna C. Roper, adjunct associate professor of sociology, anthropology and social work, uncovered 17 gravesites at Meadowlark Hills during an excavation project. Of 17 graves, four were empty and only five bodies could be identified by name.

Though the excavation revealed little information regarding the lives of these individuals, much can be taken from their death. Researchers learned of diseases that plagued the area, building trends of the time and burial arrangements for individuals.

Linda Glasgow, Riley County Historical Museum registrar, said a cemetery existed, but details were foggy before the excavation.

"When we first went to the site we basically went out and we had no real indications of what that cemetery was like and nobody knew - there were no historical records," Roper said. "We had no idea of the size of the cemetery, the structure or any of that kind of thing."

In 1860, 500 acres of property were patented to William Henry Stillman, Roper said. As both a farmer and practicing physician, Stillman hired several laborers and assistants to help him manage his land. Stillman supposedly ran an unofficial poor farm and house boarders.

"Stillman did run an unofficial poor farm for the county, and there are stories that he ran an orphanage, but no evidence of that exists, though there were many children in the cemetery," Roper said. "All we can do is take some educated guesses as to what might have been here."

As one of the five identified people buried near Meadowlark Hills, Stillman passed away in 1900 and was relocated to Sunset Cemetery in 1901. The other individuals identified include Elsie Stillman, Geary Taylor, Martha Jane Taylor, Sarah Jane Jackson and Eliza Peters.

During the excavation process, button positioning and belt buckles were used to determine the gender and age of individuals. However, no jewelry or crosses were found on the site.

Soil samples sent to France by the excavation team revealed three of the buried had dysentery and one had roundworm, Roper said.

"We think maybe they were treating somebody's roundworm with arsenic, and that might have killed them," Roper said. "That's an indication of health conditions at that time."

Through forensic work, workers were able to find causes of death for other buried individuals as well.

Sarah Jane Jackson was about four years old when she died. Reports indicate her clothes caught fire and she burned to death, said Roper. Her remains were buried in a dress with a gravestone bearing the initials "SJJ."

At the age of 18 months, Elsie Stillman, William Stillman's daughter, died after eating pills while playing in her father's office. She was relocated with her father in 1901.

Many residents near the Meadowlark area said they enjoyed having a piece of Manhattan history in their own backyards.

"We actually interviewed people that lived right next to it about it, and they were just thankful that it was properly done and it was a very historical part of Manhattan," said Jeff Chapman, Meadowlark Hills Director. "It's just part of the area, and they're happy to have it there."

TO THE POINT

University makes smart hire

Many students might not have heard of Dr. Juergen Richt yet, but his presence soon might improve K-State's animal research contributions across the Midwest and the nation.

K-State's recent hiring of Richt, the lead scientist at the U.S. Department of Agriculture's National Animal Disease Center, can be summarized in one word — intelligent.

With research starting in early 2008 at the $54 million Biosecurity Research Institute, the nation's top research scientists are key to its success. Richt will have his own research staff with a research technician and assistant professor.

Richt's research experience involves dangerous diseases. He is a member of the American Society for Virology and the International Society for Neurovirology, which places him among the best in his field.

Hires like Richt provide university officials and administration with reassurance that K-State will continue to attract only the best and the brightest researchers and scientists.

The hiring also helps put the university and Manhattan on the global research map. The span from Manhattan to greater Kansas City to St. Joseph, Mo., accounts for almost 32 percent of the total sales in the global animal-health market.

Most students might not understand the type of research that Richt and his team will conduct at K-State. However, it is important to realize that the university strives for only the world's best researchers and scientists in its laboratories. Richt's arrival in April 2008 will prove K-State's dedication to fine academics and research.

TO THE POINT is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

Socialized health care would raise taxes, is not the answer

The failed 1993 health care reform plan is being shocked back to life with a defibrillator.

Hillary Clinton recently released her $110 billion health care plan requiring every U.S. citizen to purchase health insurance. The long and short of this plan is socialized health care, as the government would collectively own and control the means of distribution for the insurance.

While this plan might appeal to ignorant individuals who believe the government should give all individuals equal health care, the fact of the matter is this plan would actually be quite unfair.

Smokers will pay the same for their insurance plan as non-smokers. Obese individuals will pay the same as those who are in shape. Alcoholics' plans will cost the same as everyone else's.

It is also "appealing" because it makes sense everyone should be required to have health insurance, doesn't it? Nearly 46 million Americans are without health insurance, a notion Michael Moore touted in his summer should-have-been-made-for-TV movie, "Sicko."

There is no question the statistic is disturbing at first glance. But at second and third glance, it is not quite as scary.

Linda Chavez, chair of the Center for Equal Opportunity, said the figure taken from Census data published in 2005 is a bit misleading. She believes the reasons why so many are uninsured are because individuals are young, healthy and choose not to buy health insurance. Several surveyed are simply between jobs and decide not to pay the premiums for continued coverage.

"More than 17 million of those counted as uninsured earn more than $50,000 a year, including 9 million who make over $75,000," says Chavez. "Nearly half of the 46 million uninsured remain so for only a brief time, on average four months."

The fact of the matter is the statistic of 46 million uninsured is not quite the travesty so many leftists make it out to be.

Chavez went on to say, "... when the numbers are dissected, the health care 'crisis' comes down to, according to some estimates, fewer than 10 million Americans who lack long-term access to ... coverage."

By looking at these figures, because of less than 10 million individuals, Hillary Clinton — and many other socialists — want to change the way everyone else receives health care.

Gregg Jackson, nationally acclaimed author and talk-radio host, says, "We will lose this country," in regards to the creation of a socialist health care system.

Let's not forget about the minor detail of Clinton's plan, the $110 billion sticker price.

This hefty price tag would undoubtedly raise taxes, something so many leftists claim to be against. Because of this, Jackson says, "We'll all be slaves of the state."

Is the United States' health care system perfect? Of course not.

After all, it is already quasi-socialized. A full-blown socialized institution is not the right answer. Unfortunately, many uninformed citizens believe it is.

CHUCK ARMSTRONG

Some police officers abuse power they have from positions of authority

When it comes to people who are supposed to protect our safety, sometimes they take power too far.

Police officers hold one of the highest positions of power in our society. From speeding tickets to homicides, these officers are there to keep citizens safe and alive.

Unfortunately, there are some officers who use this position of respect in the wrong way.

Last week, a student was Tasered during a campus forum at the University of Florida. The student was asking multiple questions to U.S. Sen. John Kerry, D-Mass., and after being asked to stop, he was Tasered.

He was excited and loud, but not harmful or out of control.

The people who had problems with the excessive questioning were not the students nor Senator John Kerry but the campus police themselves.

According to Alachua County jail records, the student was arrested on charges of resisting an officer and disturbing the peace.

"The police department does have a standard procedure for when they use force, including when they use a Taser," University Spokesman Steve Orlando said. "That is what the internal investigation would address — whether the proper procedures were followed, whether the officers acted appropriately."

There are hundreds of other cases happening each year involving the use of excessive police force.

On April 28 in Waxahachie, Texas, a man with rheumatoid arthritis, called 911 when having a diabetic seizure. Instead of the help he was expecting, police broke down his door with guns and proceeded to Taser him multiple times while he laid in bed.

According to the Waxahachie Daily Light, the man said, "I respect the law and police, but on this day I was a shooting target for them when I needed help."

Police are hired to keep the peace and also defend the rights we have as U.S. citizens. When they overstep boundaries, they actually take away these rights.

When officers beat helpless old men or Taser college students who only want their questions answered, they are committing a crime much more heinous than those they might claim to prevent. If police officers want to be helpful to society, they should put their Tasers away and use discretion.

tion.

There are homicides, suicides, rapes, burglaries and other horrific things happening in our country.

Instead of worrying about senators in bathrooms, pay raises and funding citizens at public forums, they should be doing their job by protecting us from more dangerous issues.

Taxpayers pay the salaries of the police force, and no one pays taxes to get Tasered during unnecessary times. Having Tasers is not an issue in this. However, police officers should use them when it is actually protocol or when someone is being harmed.

The officers who use their power by overstepping their boundaries become deadly bullies.

But these bullies have Tasers, the ability to throw us into jail and even to mark our permanent record forever.

It is time for them to get over being a big bad cop. Take it from the college student at UF: "Don't Tase me, bro! What did I do?"

Damn, it feels good to be a RAPPER

Model your success after lives of 2 competitive recording artists

The following step-by-step guide is a satirical piece about the feud between Kanye West and 50 Cent.

With the recent feud between 50 Cent and Kanye West, the rap world is all the more salient. Fiddy and West are two of the most popular rappers today and both became famous in very different ways. Those who want to become famous rappers usually don't know where to start. The following is a step-by-step, easy-to-follow guide on becoming a hip-hop superstar — using Fiddy and West as examples.

A POSSE

YOUR WAY — The posse you roll with might be the most important element of becoming famous. When in a sticky situation, members of your group will help you out of the jam. For instance, when P.Diddy got in trouble a few years ago at a New York club, Shyne, a member of his group, shot a man who was bothering him. If Shyne was not around to take care of the problem, Diddy would have had to shoot the man himself and suffer the same fate as Shyne, a lengthy jail sentence. A posse with people willing to do anything to keep the rapper from getting in trouble with the law is absolutely key.

KANYE'S WAY — For those who don't know, West rolls with what might be the most powerful posse in hip-hop. As a member of the Roc-A-Fella label, West rubs elbows with the likes of Jay-Z, Freeway and DJ Clue. Kanye is pretty good about staying out of situations involving weapons. His set recently helped him avoid controversy at the MTV Video Music Awards. West was upset with MTV, and he raved he would never again work with the network. To keep him out of trouble, West's posse pushed him into an elevator.

FIDDY'S WAY — When you're from a rough Queens, N.Y., neighborhood sometimes it helps to have someone else to take the gunshots and drive-by's with you. After releasing a mix-tape compilation in 2002, 50 Cent was discovered by Eminem and quickly moved up the ranks on the coattails of Slim Shady and Dr. Dre. Fiddy never forgot his homies once he made the big time and established his own label, G-Unit Records. He surrounded himself with the likes of Young Buck, Lloyd Banks and Tony Yayo.

SOUND

YOUR WAY — Believe it or not, this is not the most important element in becoming a rap superstar. These days, most rappers just use the music as something to sell. It works out well, though, because after they sell their compact discs, they can buy more expensive things and talk about how much they can spend.

ERIC DAVIS

KANYE'S WAY — Many consider West's "College Dropout" to be one of the greatest albums of all time. Since the 2004 release, West released two more albums, neither matching "Dropout." The answer to the question of why his albums have gotten worse is easy. He ran out of things to talk about. There are only so many songs you can sing about being a college dropout, getting in a car wreck and having famous friends and lots of money.

FIDDY'S WAY — When trying to establish a rap dynasty, it is no longer important to rap against the "man" or foster cultural change. Instead, 50 Cent raps about women, money and feuds with other rappers and turns it into a billion-dollar success. The extent of Fiddy's early career was trashing other New York rappers. In his song "Piggy Bank," Fiddy challenges the likes of Fat Joe, Nas and Jadakiss. If fact, 50 Cent perfected this tactic in his feud with former G-Unit member "The Game," who left the group after refusing to feud with other rappers. Fiddy released such tracks as "300 Bars and Runnin'" and "Not Rich, Still Lyin,'" both of which were aimed at The Game.

STYLE

YOUR WAY — Many rappers will tell you it doesn't matter what you do if you don't have the hip-hop image. Diamonds are usually the most important items in the outfit and Kanye and Fiddy have a lot of them. There are almost as many different types of images as there are rappers, but all are distinct and fueled by too much money.

KANYE'S WAY — Kanye has a lot of money, and like most in the rap world, he wears items that let you know. He wears a lot of very expensive clothes and jewelry and drives nice cars, and then he raps about them to let those who can't see him know how much money he has. The clothes, jewelry and cars create an image that is almost bigger than his ego.

FIDDY'S WAY — Many rappers establish their own clothing or jewelry lines to stay ahead of the pack. 50 Cent is no stranger to this strategy. In 2003, he teamed up with Mark Ecko to establish the G-Unit Clothing Company. The company tries to personify the "style of the streets," using coordinated colors juxtaposed with small but noticeable features in an effort to complement the group's raw image and savvy persona.

AggieFest a success, might put Manhattan on the music-tour map

Manhattan experienced two days of peace, love and music. No, I'm not referring to Woodstock but AggieFest. Though it did not compare to some other larger and more historic music festivals, AggieFest was definitely impressive in terms of Manhattan's size. Aggiefest boasted 92 bands playing at nine different venues and the event was a big success, in part, because it appealed to so many different types of people. There were bands of many different musical genres present, including hip-hop, country, bluegrass, Ska and — of course — rock. The festival also didn't discriminate against people not fortunate enough to be of legal drinking age. Many of the bars allowed an 18-and-over crowd and some of the venues even had all-ages shows. Another plus for the festival was the fact that there were so many different venues. It was a great atmosphere concerts because each bar had its own special stage setup and drink specials, and to a certain extent, its own unique crowd. Each bar offered a different experience. If you saw a show at O'Malley's, you were out on the patio. If you saw a show at the KatHouse you had an indoor, smoke-free atmosphere. If you saw a show at Auntie Mae's, you had a huge staircase in front of you. The shows were well planned, with artists performing a roughly 45-minute set every hour, on the hour. This made the schedule easy to follow. Many of the bands performed at multiple locations, making it easy to see the act you wanted to see. Though it was an awesome weekend, there are some areas for improvement. The schedule sheets were not nearly as readily available as they should have been, making it difficult for everyone to know who was playing where and at what time. Secondly, some of the bars charged an additional cover. When tickets to the festival run $12 to $15, depending on when you bought them, they should cover all shows, period.

MARK

Historically, Manhattan hasn't been particularly noted for its music scene, but AggieFest proved it can possibly change that image. Manhattan is a community that has shown time and time again that it is can unite in support of local issues. If you're looking for proof of that, just go anywhere in this town on a game day and all you will see is purple. If the music lovers of Manhattan could support our local scene with half of the intensity as our football fans do, great things could happen. Many people think the Manhattan community is too small to draw good music, but consider this: Manchester, Tenn. has a population of only 8,294, yet every year it draws nearly 100,000 music fans for the 4-day Bonnaroo Music and Arts Festival. AggieFest is a good way to get Manhattan on the map. Who knows — maybe a day will come when the Midwest is no longer skipped over by artists who think they have no fans here.

Extra steps make workout effective

You've heard it once — maybe twice — and now you're going to hear it again.

Warming up and cooling down are imperative to a good workout, yet few people include them in their routine. How often have you walked into the Peters Recreation Complex, put your stuff in a cubby and walked straight over to the bench press?

KENDALL HALL

There have been numerous studies on the benefits of warming up before vigorous aerobic exercise. The American Council on Exercise lists a few reasons.

The first reason is that warming up increases the degradation of oxyhemoglobin, which enhances the delivery of oxygen to the cells. It increases body temperature, which helps you avoid injuries.

It increases blood flow to muscles and to the heart, which makes your body more efficient at replenishing energy you've used and reduces the chances of you experiencing a cardiac emergency.

Warming up also decreases the viscosity of the muscle — making it more supple and powerful. It causes an early onset of sweating, which helps you stay cool and not overheat, and it enhances the speed of transmission of nerve impulses, which ultimately leads to better performance and coordination.

Warming up also increases the blood saturation of muscles and connective tissues, which means your performance and stretching will be more effective.

Finally, it prepares the cardiovascular system and muscles for more strenuous physical activity.

How hard is it to jump on an elliptical machine for 10 minutes before your weightlifting routine? When you consider how much more effective your body is going to be afterward, it's certainly worth it.

You warm up. You work out. You leave. Fitness professionals everywhere are shaking their heads in exasperation. You're forgetting about your cool down. "But I warmed up," you say. Isn't that enough? It's a good start.

Cooling down prepares your body to stop exercising. By taking 10 minutes to walk around the track, or even work out your abs when you're done lifting, you allow your heart rate to slow gradually, and your body temperature and blood pressure can fall slowly.

This is a great time to stretch as well. New studies have shown you get more benefit from stretching after exercise than before, since your muscles are already warm.

Why stretch? Ever see those guys walking around who can't lift their arms above their head or scratch their own backs? Just ask them how much fun it is when they get an itch. Do you pull your hamstrings or quadriceps every time you move faster than a walk? Stretching would help you prevent those painful injuries.

A balanced workout has many components, but the main focuses should be warming up, conditioning and cooling down. Even if you don't have much time to work out one particular day, professionals recommend you cut the time during your conditioning phase. Warmups and cool downs should last at least 5 to 10 minutes. A few extra minutes aren't going to hurt your social schedule, and your body will thank you in a few years.

Kyle Smell added to the Wildcats' final score of the third round with a 5-over 77. Smell finished the tournament 79-75-77-231 (+15) for 25th.

When little mistakes are added up, they can become a big problem.

For the K-State men's golf team, those mis-cues were the difference between challenging for the win and placing second at the Jim Colbert Intercollegiate golf tournament.

Still, coach Tim Norris said he was pleased with the Wildcats' overall performance.

"We played well, and we did a lot of good things," Norris said. "When you get beat, you just get beat, and that's what Miami of Ohio did."

The Wildcats finished in second place with a score of 23-over par, while Miami of Ohio shot 11-over par, taking home the title.

Marquette came in third, shooting 34-over and Akron posted 47-over, finishing fourth. Rounding out the top five was Missouri State with a 50-over par total.

Even with Miami controlling the tournament from start to finish, Norris said his team wasn't discouraged.

"Playing with great players is a way to learn how to play golf right," Norris said. "You have to beat everyone in this sport, but our showing definitely proves that we can play."

In individual play, sophomores Mitchell Gregson and Robert Streb finished in a tie for fourth. Both players shot even par 72 in the final round.

Freshman Joe Ida shot 3-over 75 to finish in a tie for 12th. Senior Kyle Yonke and freshman Kyle Smell finished in a tie for 25th. Yonke shot 79, while Smell carded a 4-over 75.

Streb, who was paired with tournament winner Michael Drobnick from Miami of Ohio, said he was satisfied with the Wildcats' performance.

"We did well, and it's always important have a chance to win," Streb said. "Having the tournament at home helped a lot, but we just got outplayed today."

Gregson said he was pleased with his driving but said he left some shots on the course.

"I was really pleased with my ball striking, but I really need to need to be more consistent with my par and birdie opportunities," Gregson said.

Gregson said if everyone plays well at the same time, they'll have a good chance to take home a first-place finish.

"It just seems like we take turns playing good," Gregson said. "If we can all play good together, we really have a chance to win."

Putting continues to be a concern of the Wildcats as they prepare for their next tournament, the Wolf Pack Classic in Reno, Nev., Oct. 8-9.

"We still have a lot to prove, and our putters have to get better," Streb said. "We need to shoot no worse than bogey, but if we do make mistakes, we need to be able to rely on our short game to come back."

Norris said his players can learn from their mistakes in this tournament and use the Colbert Intercollegiate as a confidence-builder.

"Teams earn the trophy out on the greens," Norris said. "Once we start putting better, the players realize that golf looks easier because they see the ball go in the hole."

Wildcats look to pick up another Big 12 win tonight against Missouri in Ahearn Field House

By Joel Jellison
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Coming off its first conference loss of the season, the K-State volleyball team trailed Colorado in the fifth game of Saturday's match. But even then, coach Suzie Fritz said she wasn't worried.

"One of the things I know about this team is they have the ability to turn it around," said Fritz.

"Once they flip that switch and decide it's time to go, they play immensely well."

K-State flipped the switch and won against Colorado and will try to do the same against Missouri at 7 p.m. tonight at Ahearn Field House.

The Tigers have struggled lately, losing all three Big 12 Conference matches after starting the season with a 7-2 record.

Missouri swept the series with the Wildcats last season and has won the last four meetings.

The team will try to keep the momentum it had at Colorado.

K-State came back from a 2-1 deficit against Colorado on Saturday before recovering to win 3-2.

The Wildcats got the win despite posting their lowest hitting percentage since early in the season.

"I feel like defensively we wanted to play with a greater sense of urgency," Fritz said. "It was a very spontaneous game."

"There were a lot of unorthodox things that happened in the Colorado match that magnified some things about our team."

Fritz said the loss last Wednesday to Oklahoma taught the team some early lessons about Big 12 play.

"We played relatively well, but we made some tactical errors down the road that just didn't allow us to win it," Fritz said.

"I think what we learned from it is every night out in the Big 12 is going to be like that. You just don't get a break."

K-State is coming off back-to-back five-game matches for the first time this season. The five-game match streak started against Oklahoma, when K-State's streak of five-straight sweeps ended.

"We don't care how many games it takes," Fritz said. "We are just in it to play as well as we can for as long as we have to."

RESEARCH | Richt to work at BRI

mean two things — the professors are very prestigious in their field, and there is a potential for economic growth in that area," Richardson said.

Richt, also an adjunct professor at Iowa State University, said he hopes to establish a zoonotics research center at K-State's Biosecurity Research Institute.

"They offered a great opportunity at K-State with the new BRI," Richt said. "That's a very exciting opportunity."

Richt said the program would focus on four main areas of research: pathogenesis, the origination and development of a disease; vaccine development; diagnosis and therapy. The research would focus on four or five zoonotic diseases like animal flu and Mad Cow Disease, or BSE.

Richardson said the diseases Richt will research are infectious and possibly harmful if not contained.

"These diseases, if they were to infect our livestock, would be devastating to the economy," Richardson said.

Richardson said Richt could not research these diseases if the BRI did not exist at K-State.

Though the BRI will not be ready for research until early 2008, BRI Director Jim Stack said the institute will be ready for Richt and his staff, which will include at least a research technician and assistant professor. He said the institute is testing all equipment and facilities extensively. He said Richt provides assurance to the BRI.

"It's a tremendous shot in the arm," he said. "It gives us confidence that we have the proper infrastructure to attract doctors like Richt."

Richt said he has visited K-State numerous times and was impressed with the university administrator's commitment to biosecurity research.

"Their commitment to livestock research and their willingness to build on that research is great to me," he said.

Richt also said he was impressed with the community and regional support of the BRI and the possibility of the National Bio and Agro-Defense Facility in Manhattan.

"What I liked is not only the people at K-State but also the community," he said. "The community wants to help to attract people to the area and also supports the kind of research I plan to do."

Stack said Richt's research on infectious diseases will benefit the community and region, especially the Kansas City Animal Health Corridor — the area from Manhattan to Kansas City to St. Joseph's, Mo. that accounts for almost 32 percent of total sales in the global animal-health market.

"Kansas is a state where the standard of living and health and agriculture are integrally linked," Stack said. "The research should strengthen the relationship with K-State and the industry that supports Kansas."

Richardson said the College of Veterinary Medicine will help Richt as much as they can, including graduate and veterinary-student research. Richt said he was excited to work in a veterinary setting — a setting he said he was used to at Iowa State.

The hiring of Richt will affect the BRI, College of Veterinary Medicine and the university through more than just his research. Stack said Richt will attract other renowned scientists to the institute. Stack said he already has heard from scientists interested in the work at K-State.

"It becomes an attractor," he said. "If you see someone like Richt coming to K-State, it is because he believes he can be successful here. Other scientists see they can do that too."

MIGRANT | Dept. of Education accepts only 8 of 36 applications

According to a July 23 article in the Lawrence Journal-World, only eight of 36 grant applications received by universities were accepted.

The program serves about 2,400 CAMP participants annually and provides counseling, tutoring, skills work shops, health services and housing assistance. It also ensures that participants receive full and appropriate opportunities to meet the same state and student academic achievement standards that all children are expected to meet, according to the article.

KU benefited from the grant for five years until the U.S. Department of Education denied the university's grant request to continue the program in September 2006. As many as 24 students a year were provided tuition for six credit hours and $750 in living expenses per semester, according to the Lawrence Journal-World article.

Some Kansas residents question the denial of what could have been nearly statewide funding for the state's exploding migrant population in need of bilingual and multicultural instruction and career educational services.

"As an agricultural school, giving immigrants a chance to succeed would make K-State look good," Clay Cheney, Manhattan resident, said. "They need to make it work and give these kids a chance."

This old house

Photos by Christopher Hanewinkel | COLLEGIAN

The Strasser House located on the corner of Fourth and Laramie streets is the oldest house in Manhattan and is located in the heart of the redevelopment area. There is a debate with Manhattan officials on whether to leave the house in its current location or attempt to move it to make way for a new store in the area.

Oldest home might relocate for redevelopment

By Elise Podhajsky
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

On the corner of Fourth and Laramie streets sits an old stone house. Dead, spindle-like vines hug its weathered walls, while two tall trees stand guard outside its front door. These vines and these trees are the only remaining companions to the house.

A chain-link fence boxes the house in, separating it from the dirt piles, concrete blocks, flashing orange barricades and bulldozers that surround it.

The house: a lonely prisoner on the land, which it has spent so many years presiding over. The prosecutor: Dial Realty. The defendants: the Board of Historic Resources. The judge: the City of Manhattan.

The stone house at 326 Laramie St. is the oldest standing house in Manhattan, which resides in the heart of the downtown redevelopment project. It faces potential relocation by Dial Realty to allow the corporation to make more room for its new shopping center. Being the oldest standing property in Manhattan, the house has been nominated for the State and National Register of Historic Places. However, if moved, the house's potential to be granted state and national recognition would severely decrease. The trial for keeping the house in its original location or moving it for the sake of a new grocery store has been going on for quite some time.

On Oct. 1, the Manhattan Urban Area Planning Board potentially could reach a verdict during its meeting. But for now, the defendant and the prosecutor continue to fight for their cases, each citing conflicting information about the historical value of the house.

THE FACTS

Patricia O'Brien researched and compiled the history of the house in the April 2007 Manhattan/Riley County Preservation Alliance Newsletter. She found that the house, first known as the Strasser House, was built in 1875. The New England-style home was purchased by Phillipena Strasser and presumably was used as a boarding house as well as a home for the Strasser family.

Over the years, the house has had many different occupants including Henley H. Haymaker in 1936 and Charles R. "Dick" Dickens in 1988. Haymaker was a professor of plant pathology and was appointed to the board of the Kansas State Agricultural College Memorial Stadium Corporation in 1943. Haymaker Hall is named in his honor.

Dickens was the first commissioner of the Manhattan City League Baseball program and continued his service with the organization for more than 40 years. The C.R. Dickens press box in Anneberg Park is dedicated in his memory.

Dickens' son, Robert, inherited the house after his father's death. He and his wife have been the most recent residents until the house was purchased by Dial Realty in 2006.

Vines scale most of the four sides of the oldest standing house in Manhattan. A verdict is expected on the future of the house as soon as Oct. 1 during a Manhattan Urban Area Planning Board meeting.

THE CONTROVERSY

A memorandum of agreement, or MOA, between the City of Manhattan and the Kansas State Historic Preservation officer was signed in the spring of 2006. This agreement covers seven residential structures including the Strasser House. The MOA states that the city will not issue any permits to allow these properties to be demolished or removed. However, it also states that any party involved with the agreement —

C-SPAN's Campaign 2008 Bus will make a tour stop at K-State today.

Students and faculty members have the opportunity to tour the 45-foot bus from noon to 4 p.m. at the southeast corner of Ahearn Field House. The bus provides nonpartisan information about next year's presidential election and the campaign trail, said Heath Neiderer, C-SPAN marketing supervisor.

C-SPAN selected K-State as a tour stop because it is stopping on Friday in Abilene, Kan., for an educational outreach program at the Eisenhower Presidential Center, Neiderer said. K-State also has many politically active students and majors like journalism, political science and education that apply to C-SPAN, he said.

"With our new look, universities have been a great stop for us," he said. "We thought we'd stop by for a few hours and help students and professors and answer their questions about C-SPAN."

Professor gives presentation about Latina sexuality on TV

By Whitney Hodgins
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Tanya González used songs written and performed by white men to introduce the topics of feminism, ethnicity and Latina sexuality in her presentation, "Ugly Betty: The trouble with being good."

About 35 people attended the presentation Wednesday afternoon in the K-State Student Union as part of the scheduled Hispanic Heritage Month events.

Those in attendance watched the music video for "Big Girl (You are Beautiful)," a song written by London-based artist Mika, flashed clips of the singer surrounded by many vibrant, colorful women embracing and flaunting the vast, physical differences between their bodies.

González, assistant professor of English, said that version of the song, which exchanged the words "big girl" with "Betty," was written specifically for the second season of NBC's primetime comedy, "Ugly Betty."

She moved from the music video to address the irony of the entertainment industry christening actress America Ferrera as the new, curvy role model for Latinas, while most of "Betty's" audience secretly tunes in to see her thick, endearing eyebrows furrowed in determination to prove that at least she's pretty on the inside.

"I saw the headline 'Ugly Betty is Hot' on the cover of a magazine," González said. "And another that said 'Ugly is the new Pretty.' It's explicit that Betty's beauty on the show is still a costume of ugly beauty."

González did praise the show because it encouraged discussion of topics generally neglected by primetime television — mainly the perspective of a 20-something, second-generation Latina in the New York fashion world.

"It's hard to see her get beat up for her ethnicity and gender," she said. "The inverse relationship between moral goodness and beauty within the Latin culture is exaggerated on the show, which puts pressure on Betty to live up to an image that reinforces the Chicana familia romance."

That stereotype that perpetuates the fantasy of Latina motherhood and sexual purity brought out questions from audience members grappling with their own interpretations of the show's message.

PEOPLE IN THE NEIGHBORHOOD

Student embraces heritage, promotes diversity on campus

By Christine Caplinger
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Uriel Estrada is president of the Hispanic American Leadership Organization, which is cosponsoring Hispanic Heritage Month – Sept. 15 to Oct. 15. Estrada, senior in secondary education, is involved in several other campus organizations and is active in diversity events.

How did you get involved with the Hispanic American Leadership Organization?

I became involved because of one of my friends. I joined my freshman year, but the times of the meetings changed, and I couldn't get involved as much as I wanted. My sophomore year, I went to every event, and this year – here I am.

What are some other things that you are involved in on campus?

The Kansas Bridges to the Future program and the Developing Scholars Program, which is an undergraduate research program on campus. I also am involved in Sigma Lambda Beta International fraternity and am a multicultural ambassador.

How do you and your family embrace your Hispanic-American heritage?

Every year we do traditional Mexican events. By doing some of the traditional events, we embrace our heritage.

What is your favorite part of K-State?

I love the campus itself, and the students are so friendly. The faculty is so helpful, and there are many types of extra-curriculars you can do.

How do you think K-State celebrates its diversity?

Definitely by having a diversity panel. There are a number of panels where there are all kinds of students who present their experiences. They let high-school and college students experience a culture other than themselves. Also, they let students promote their cultures on campus.

What are your plans after college?

I plan to go to graduate school. Ideally, I want to go to graduate school at K-State, but I wouldn't mind going somewhere else.

Where do you see yourself in five years?

I see myself working at a university in the Midwest – something to do with education. I want to work closely with other students who want to pursue a career in education.

Joslyn Brown | COLLEGIAN

Uriel Estrada, president of the Hispanic American Leadership Organization and senior in secondary education, is working on two important projects for Encuentro today at the K-State Student Union Ballroom. He is also planning events for Hispanic Heritage Month.

HOUSE | Board will decide whether to relocate city's oldest home which includes the owners of the Strasser house, Dial Realty – is entitled to make amendments to the MOA if that party has the approval of the city and of the preservation officer.

THE PROBLEM

Dial, the lawful owners of the Strasser property, want to amend the MOA in order to make room for the new Fourth Street shopping center. It is now up to the city and its advisers to make that final decision. The Board of Historic Resources, an adviser to the city, wants the house to stay.

"(The house) is the last remaining piece of that neighborhood that hasn't been moved, so it's very historic," Michael Mecseri, board member, said. "It was agreed upon by the city and Dial Realty to maintain it, and we think they should be held to that agreement."

But Rick Kiolbasa, Dial partner, said he thinks otherwise.

"We'll probably be moving it late this fall, once everything's frozen," he said. "We're going to depend on the experts to make sure everything stays intact. We're going through a process right now with the city and state, but we're reasonably certain that the best course is to move the house."

Kiolbasa also said the re-orientation of the house – about a block from where it is now – would most likely have no effect on the house's historical status.

"It's not a historical house at the moment," he said. "We've discussed that even after moving it, it would probably still be eligible for historical status."

Linda Glasgow, president of the Manhattan/Riley County Preservation Alliance, said she disagrees.

"This is a historic house that is already covered by a memorandum of the city and the Kansas Historical Society," she said. "I think that it's important to maintain the house on the site to maximize its historic impact, and if the house were to be moved, that would be a very difficult and expensive process, and there's no guarantee the house would be eligible (for the listing) anymore."

Patrick Zollner, director of cultural resources divisions for the Kansas State Historical Society, said moved properties are not normally listed in the national register, because they are significantly tied to their sites. However, there are some exceptions to this, he said, when properties have been moved but listed for architectural reasons.

"In Kansas, we won't typically do this," he said. "There have been only a handful of properties, usually bridges, that have been listed with relocation."

So could the Strasser House fall into these exceptions?

"The answer is typically no," Zollner said. "Is it possible? Perhaps. But moving it certainly lessens the likelihood."

Tom Roberts, the Historic Resources Board chair said in the board's meeting Monday that he thinks the board has said, "Enough compromise."

"The people who put together the original agreement ought to follow the original agreement," Roberts said. "We can question the negotiations and other things and be entitled to our own personal opinions, but from a Historic Resources standpoint, I think it's clear for the Strasser house, the impact on the neighborhood, and the long-term significance to the community, that it needs to stay."

Rwandan radio soap opera might help end violence

Rwanda on April 6, 1994: Hutus gave the order to start the extermination of the Tutsi tribe over the radio station RTLM. For the next 100 days the station was devoted purely to spreading Tutsi hate propaganda. When the attacks stopped after two months, the radio station was silenced.

KEVIN PHILLIPS

Fast forward to July 6, when National Public Radio's "On the Media" reported RTLM is back on the air after a 10-year ban. But now, the format is just a little different, changing from hate propaganda to hope — specifically, a radio soap opera.

Since the genocide in 1994, tension has been a continuous problem. As the Africa News on Sept. 4 reported, there are small Hutu and Tutsi militias still trying to eradicate each other in Rwanda and its neighboring country, the Democratic Republic of the Congo. Amidst this violence, RTLM radio has re-emerged with its new show — "Musekweya," or "New Dawn."

The show is described as "a Rwandan version of Romeo and Juliet." But beyond mere entertainment, the producers claim a larger purpose — by understanding how violence starts, they hope people will understand how to avoid it and begin reconciling their differences.

Running twice a week, the July 9 Rwanda Wire reported "Musekweya" to be the most popular show in the country. It claimed a 90-percent audience share.

The show has found an interesting time in Rwanda's development to try and piece together problems from the past and avoid repeating the same problems in the future.

"Musekweya" takes place in a pre-genocide time, and the narratives represent a way for people today to talk about how to avoid the next round of violence without having dealt with the past directly.

Noteworthy in Rwanda right now is U.N. Resolution 1503, which calls for International Criminal Tribunals for genocide suspects. These criminal tribunals have brought new insight to the 1994 genocide. "Musekweya" is trying to remind people how to avoid the mistake they made in the past.

One key aspect to the show is the avoidance of two very important names — Hutu and Tutsi — to avoid alarming the Tutsi government.

However, anyone can recognize which village is Hutu and which is Tutsi, and the characters deal with the real-life issues of fires, thefts, murder and the constant threat of one village attacking the other.

As Newsvine stated on Aug. 4, the show is continuously on the edge of all-out violence — stopped only by communication.

The stories incorporate issues that used to and continue to divide the people, but every time they're on the edge of violence, the narrative's moral is that, through communication, people can prevent violence.

The show is helping the people and government reconnect and is acting as a reconciliation tool for the entire country. The show is also broadcast in English on the Internet to reach a more diverse audience.

Hutus and Tutsis have been taught to hate each other for close to a decade. Perhaps now the station that helped start the violence could be the same one to end it.

Kevin Phillips is a senior in legal communication. Please send comments to opinion@pub.ksu.edu.

TO THE POINT C-SPAN a learning experience

K-State students will have the opportunity to get a nonpartisan look at the upcoming presidential election when C-SPAN's Campaign 2008 Bus makes a stop on campus.

The bus is not out to promote any candidate in particular and is not affiliated with the federal government in any way.

The fact that it is nonpartisan is great for students, because it will give an unbiased look at the presidential elections. This also should give people who have a lot of questions about politics the opportunity to have their questions answered.

Even though we are a predominately conservative school, C-SPAN still chose to make K-State as a stop on its tour, and this is a great opportunity for students to make their voices heard.

This is important, because it shows the network cares more about educating voters than trying to win them to one side or the other.

It is important for students to visit the bus because the upcoming presidential election will greatly affect area residents, especially those in Fort Riley.

There are many important issues involving the United States in the coming election, with the most important one being the war in Iraq.

The new president most likely will change policies regarding the war, and if we as students are uneducated on how to vote, our voice cannot be heard.

It is always important to vote, and the nonpartisan view the bus will offer be good for education.

Fast-food chains have improved image, not healthiness

There is nothing better than a good, greasy cheeseburger and fries. I'm not ashamed to admit I visit fast-food venues more than anyone should.

However, while patiently waiting for my turn in the drive-thru, I am aware of the conscious decision to fill my body with food that is the definition of unhealthy. All the flashy advertising signs of salads and smoothies do not deter me — I go for my pile of grease.

Fast-food giant McDonald's has long enjoyed their consumers, who desire unhealthy — but tasty — food. Recently, fast-food joints have tried to revamp their image and offer healthier choices, like grilled chicken wraps and fruit.

Many have been fooled by these ad campaigns. An article on the MSNBC Web site said McDonald's, which has experienced a slump in sales after being hammered for contributing to obesity, is now on the rise again after some major marketing changes.

These changes don't run deep. They slapped a few low-cal choices on the menu and promised to — eventually — cook with oil free of artery-clogging trans fat on certain items.

McDonald's even went to such great lengths as to invite a few moms over to convince them that they weren't bad guys, as a part of their "Moms' Quality Correspondents" program.

Now, obviously, these aren't bad changes. Their efforts to improve the menu is evidence of at least a half-hearted attempt to show they care about their customers.

However, this is only a case of some serious public relations work. Good PR, but PR all the same. Adding a salad to the menu is not going to convince the "Two Big Macs a Day" guy to order a Southwest Salad and a Diet Coke. All it will do is draw in a few new, health-conscious customers.

Not all the new menu items are healthy, though they are being passed off as healthy alternatives. According to the McDonald's Web site, a Southwest Salad with crispy chicken has 400 calories, approximately the same as a double cheeseburger. The Asian Salad has 17 grams of fat.

It's all just pretty packaging and an attempt to reassure the customer eating at McDonald's won't make their jeans a little tighter.

Unfortunately, this isn't true. The root of most fast-food places will always be the same old burger-and-fries items. If companies like McDonald's honestly care about consumers and not just drawing in new ones, serious steps need to be taken to ensure long-term health.

The answer lies in making existing food healthier, not sprinkling in new, healthier food to shine things up.

In the meantime, I suppose I'll be forced to just drown my sorrows in a Big 'N Tasty and a Diet Coke. Perhaps the calorie-free carbonation will counteract the 460 burger calories.

A stitch in time

Students can learn to knit scarves for colder season

It's that time of year when students might need a little something extra to keep warm while walking across campus. A handmade scarf is a fun, fashionable way to do just that.

Knitting can be a good stress reliever, and while it might be hard to face the truth, it's probably a better use of free time than Facebook.com.

This method, known as the American method – the English or “throw” method – has just three parts: casting on, knitting and casting off. It is an easy method to learn.

To get started, you need one skein of yarn, which is a large roll that can be purchased at stores like Hobby Lobby or Wal-Mart. While some of the frilly, fuzzy, specialty yarns are fun to look at, they are harder to use for first-time knitters. Beginners should start with fairly simple yarn.

You also will need two knitting needles of whichever size you prefer. The smaller the needles, the tighter the stitches will be, and the bigger the needles, the looser the stitches will be.

Basically consider how “see through” you want the scarf to be. A size 10 or 11 needle is appropriate for a fairly tight scarf, while a size 15 needle will make the knitting go faster, and still keep it tight enough.

Because many things can happen to interrupt knitting sessions, it is helpful to have point protectors to place on the ends of the needles to prevent stitches from accidentally falling off the needles.

The three parts of knitting are all described in detail at the right. Follow those, and then you will have a scarf you can enjoy.

Don't be afraid to get creative with your scarves. Make several with different colors, and don't forget to make a purple one to wear to the football games as the weather gets colder.

By the time the holidays roll around, you should be capable of making knitted gifts to give family and friends.

MISCELLANEOUS TIPS

Here are some things to keep in mind when you are knitting your scarf.

- Use stoppers to prevent stitches from falling off the needles when your knitting is interrupted by something.
- Between rows, be careful not to lose stitches off the end. They can be hard to see and hard to get back on the needle.
- After casting on and knitting a few rows, the scarf will look like it is narrower than it actually will be. So continue knitting to check it before you decide to start over.
- For an extra touch, add tassels to the ends of the finished scarf, experiment with beads, or find other ways to dress up your scarf to make it even more special.
- Left-handed knitters might find the Continental method easier to use. There are helpful videos for both methods on knittinghelp.com.

CASTING ON

1. The first step is called “casting on,” and it is when knitters set up their first row of stitches. The first step is to make a slip knot.

For the slip knot, grab the end of the yarn in one hand, with 20-30 inches of it making a tail on one side.

Cross the tail over the other side of the yarn, and pull that other side forward and in through the “eye.”

Release the first grip on the yarn and continue to pull the yarn through the eye until the eye is small enough to close around the knitting needle. Insert the needle and pull the slip knot tight. The slip knot is your first stitch.

Now you must decide how many stitches wide the scarf will be. There is no set number for this, because different knitters' stitches are narrower or wider than others. A good not-too-wide, not-too-thin scarf has about 15 stitches.

You will use only one needle to cast on stitches.

With your right hand, firmly grab the needle with the slip knot, and in your left, hold the two tails of yarn, with one tail draped over your thumb and one over your index finger.

2. Pull the right needle down so the yarn almost looks like a heart draped over your left hand.

Slide the point of your needle under the piece of yarn on the far left and 3. then over the piece of yarn on the inside of your index finger.

Pull the needle back through the two pieces of yarn on your thumb before you slide the yarn off your thumb and down onto the needle. Pull it fairly tight against the needle.

You have just cast on the second stitch. Repeat this process of sliding the needle through the yarn until you have added as many stitches as you want your scarf to have. Remember to pull each stitch close to the needle.

KNITTING

After casting on the appropriate number of stitches, you are ready to knit.

Push the stitches close to the end of the needle for easy access and move that needle to your left hand. Pick up the other needle with your right hand.

Pull off a couple feet of yarn and hold the tail of the yarn still connected to the skein in the fingers of your right hand with the needle.

4. Place the point of the empty needle on the left side of the first stitch and slide it underneath until your right needle comes up behind the left needle.

5. Wrap the yarn in your right hand around the back of the right needle to the front, and then pull the right needle down slowly. 6. Use the right needle to push that stitch off the left needle to the right.

Do this with each stitch until you finish the entire row. Again, remember to pull the stitches fairly tight against the needle so they remain consistent.

When you have completed a row, switch the needle with the stitches (in your right hand) to your left hand and pick up the empty needle in your right hand again.

Repeat the process of knitting rows of stitches until your scarf reaches your desired length.

After a few rows, you can knot off the end of the stray yarn tail and cut it off so it is out of the way. Be sure to make the knot big enough that it won't pull loose and unravel your knitting.

If you have started knitting and you think the scarf will be too wide or too narrow, slip the stitches off the needle and pull them out. Other than the slip knot, there are no knots, so the stitches will pull right out, and the yarn will be just as it was at the beginning, and you can start over.

On that same note, because the stitches will pull out so easily, be careful between rows not to drop stitches off the end of your needle and pull them out.

CASTING OFF

When your scarf is the desired length, you will need to cast off the stitches to keep the entire scarf from becoming an unraveled mess of yarn.

7. First, knit two stitches onto the other needle just like you have before.

8. Using your left needle, carefully pull the first stitch off the needle over the second stitch and let it go.

Continue the process of knitting on one stitch and pulling the other stitch off over it, but move slowly until you get the hang of it, as it is easy to pull both stitches off accidentally.

After you knit the last stitch, pull the second-to-last stitch over it.

9. Use your needle to pull the last stitch out far enough that you can make a good knot to tie off the end of your scarf. Cut off the excess after you have tied your knot.

Now you have a scarf you can enjoy during the cool, autumn weather.

Royals inch their way back

We're nearing the end of the regular season in baseball, a time rarely associated with happy thoughts about the Kansas City Royals.

Usually this time of year means most Royals fans only pay attention to see if they've reached 100 losses yet.

Once that happens — like it has in four of the previous five years — the only thing to look forward to is one final Buck Night at Kauffman Stadium.

Actually, no. Nobody even gets excited about that.

But this year, it's different. No, the Royals are not in a division race, unless you consider fighting it out with the White Sox for fourth place a race. Actually, the Royals aren't even close. They were mathematically eliminated days ago.

So, with that in mind, it doesn't sound like it's much different. But it is.

There's a better feeling surrounding this Royals team. Look at the roster, and there's reason to believe this team could compete in the near future.

Gil Meche — though his record is just 9-13 — lived up to his highly criticized $55 million contract with a 3.69 ERA. If not for Meche's league-worst run support, that record would be significantly better.

Brian Bannister (12-9, 3.87 ERA) is arguably the best rookie pitcher in the American League. Zack Greinke used a stint in the bullpen to rejuvenate his career and is throwing better than ever. (It's funny, Greinke is only 23, but it seems like he's been in the majors for 10 years. A 23-year-old who finds himself in a position where he has to rejuvenate his career is a bit odd.)

And the lineup is loaded with potential. Alex Gordon and Billy Butler look like they have the makeup to be big stars. They're 23 and 21, respectively, but they already have that plate presence that makes hitters so fearsome.

Mark Teahen and David DeJesus give the Royals two solid outfielders. Speedster Joey Gathright looks like he found a way to be a serviceable hitter.

And on and on it goes. Sure, most teams probably can look through the roster and find some players that give them hope for the future. But that's the point.

In the past, the Royals couldn't do that. They were bad at everything. They couldn't hit, pitch, field or run the bases. It was a successful night if they could just make it through without a blooper-reel play.

They were supposedly committed to a youth movement, but their lineup was always mysteriously overloaded with 30-something no-names.

In short, it was embarrassing.

So what do the small successes of this season mean? Surely, a 68-90 record with four games left won't have Kansas City throwing a parade anytime soon, but it's a start. And in baseball, that's all you need to generate some fan interest.

The Royals won't win the division next season. That's just not the way baseball works. Everything takes time. A pitcher throws four times in a row to hold a runner on first base. A manager takes forever to walk to the mound. A batter steps out of the box between every pitch, readjusting his batting gloves and helmet.

Baseball is, by nature, a slow game. And rebuilding the laughingstock of the league is no exception. It will take time, more time than most Royals fans want to admit.

But at least the Royals have taken the first step — one significant step on that long road back to respectability.

Wildcats sweep Missouri

By Jonathan Potter
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

With 15 matches left, the K-State volleyball team has matched its 2006 win total.

The Wildcats (12-3, 4-1) beat Missouri in three games (30-21, 30-20, 30-20) Wednesday, their ninth sweep of the season and third in Big 12 Conference play.

"We continue to make improvement from where we were two weeks ago, from where we were at a month ago," coach Suzie Fritz said. "We're better now than we were then."

Junior outside hitter Rita Liliom led the Wildcats in kills with 15. Liliom hit .583 on 24 attacks and also added two digs. As a team, K-State recorded 53 kills.

Liliom said she was pleased with her high hitting percentage and was glad K-State grabbed the early lead.

"It feels good to be ahead," Liliom said. "We need to come out strong and keep the pressure on them."

Liliom recorded just one error in her 24 attacks.

"I think Rita is doing an amazing job out there," said senior Angie Lastra, who led K-State with 13 digs. "She is being consistent every night, so that's helping us a lot as well as Nataly (Korobkova)."

K-State finished with a .371 hitting percentage on 105 attacks.

The Tigers hit .223 on 94 attacks, with two players hitting over .200. Missouri's Na Yang led the team in kills with 11 on 18 attacks.

Middle blockers Kelsey Chipman and Megan Farr continued their strong play, combining for 19 kills against the Tigers on over .400 hitting.

Big 12 Preseason Newcomer of the Year Nataly Korobkova entered the match leading the Wildcats in kills with 193 and added 13 against the Tigers.

Fritz said Korobkova has still not reached her potential and is continually improving.

"Nataly is capable of being exceptional," Fritz said. "She is capable of being a difference-maker."

Missouri never led during the match.

In game one, the Wildcats hit

Rita Liliom records one of her 15 kills during the final game against Missouri on Wednesday evening. The Wildcats moved to 3-1 in conference play with the 3-0 win.

.421 and finished with 18 kills. Liliom tallied six, while Farr and Chipman both added four.

Game three featured six aces for the Wildcats, including two each from Liliom and Lastra.

Liliom led K-State in aces during the match against Missouri, tallying four.

Fritz said she was pleased with the Wildcats' aggressive serving attack.

"We were consistent, aggressive and in-bounds," Fritz said.

Missouri fell to 7-6 on the season and 0-4 in conference play.

The Wildcats next action will be at Texas A&M on Friday. Play is scheduled to begin at 6:30 p.m.

Angie Lastra celebrates a point during the first game. Lastra finished with 13 digs as the Wildcats won their second-straight game with a 3-0 win over the Tigers.

WILDCAT ARCHIVES

K-State holds 3-2 record against Texas since Big 12 started

Linebackers Mark Simoneau and Jeff Kelly were two of the defensive players who anchored K-State's 1998 team. K-State held eventual Heisman Trophy winner Ricky Williams to only 43 yards.

The "Wildcat Archives" series will take a look back at a different K-Stater every week who was part of an important time in Wildcat sports history.

By Jonathan Garten
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

In 1998, the K-State football team found itself in uncharted territory. The Wildcats were considered one of the nation's elite teams.

K-State had seen recent success, but it still had to remind the national media on a yearly basis that it was legit. From 1994 to 1997, the Wildcats began seasons ranked about No. 20 in the nation before climbing their way up the polls.

Not in '98.

K-State started the year ranked No. 6 in the country — higher than it ever had been ranked before. Some of the players were also gaining a lot of preseason hype. Linebackers Jeff Kelly and Mark Simoneau were both Butkus Award candidates, and quarterback Michael Bishop received attention for the Heisman Trophy.

But despite all the hoopla, the program still lacked an abundance of wins over traditional college football powerhouses.

Kevin Haskin, who covered the K-State football team for the Topeka Capital-Journal, said he remembered a Big 12 teleconference in '98 when a reporter called in to poll the Big 12 coaches about who was the best player in the conference. Haskin said nearly every coach picked Bishop, even though Texas' Ricky Williams was in the same conference and on pace to break the NCAA career-rushing record.

"After the stories circulated, the next day or so Texas instructed the Big 12 to come out with a release to say that the poll that was conducted was unauthorized and not coordinated by the Big 12," Haskin said. "That was one of the more interesting developments outside the lines that season."

Talent aside, Haskin said he thinks Williams might have been more important to his team. Coach Mack Brown was in his first year with the Longhorns, and his team finished with a 9-3 record in '98, which

Texas QB not looking for revenge in rematch with Wildcats

By Ricky Treon
DAILY TEXAN

Colt McCoy had never been injured before facing K-State last year.

He'd been hurt like any football player. Bruises and scrapes are a necessary and almost obligatory part of the game.

But after playing the Wildcats, who also happen to be this week's opponent, Texas' starting quarterback couldn't even hold a football with his throwing hand.

"You can fight through pain," McCoy said. "There was just no way I could (still play). It took away all my strength. When something like that happens, you just have to sit back and swallow the pill. It's hard."

McCoy said the pinched nerve he suffered against K-State caused him to bulk up this summer and become more durable.

But it hasn't left him with revenge on the brain.

Like nearly all of his teammates, McCoy realizes both the Longhorns and Wildcats are different teams this year.

K-State sells remaining 275 tickets for upcoming Sunflower Showdown

The 275 tickets remaining for K-State's Oct. 6 game against Kansas have been sold.

The tickets were returned by Kansas and went on sale at 9 a.m. Wednesday morning.

The game, which starts at 11 a.m. and will be televised on FSN, is now officially sold out.

C-SPAN | Bus to visit at least 5 Kansas cities political candidates. The network also is not affiliated with the federal government.

"We do everything in our power to stay neutral," he said. "We are not affiliated with any party."

With an election-themed exterior, the bus contains a $1.3 million production studio and mainly is used for community-education outreach programs, Neiderer said. Twelve students and faculty members will tour the bus during a 20-minute presentation. The presentation includes C-SPAN program highlights, information about critical viewing and media literacy, and discussions about the 2008 presidential election.

The C-SPAN Bus program started in November 1993 as an effort to demonstrate cable's commitment to education, according to C-SPAN's Web site. The bus restarted as the Campaign 2008 Bus in January, and it since has traveled to 52 U.S. cities in 27 states.

In the last 10 days, the bus has made stops in Lawrence, Topeka and Kansas City, Mo., and it also has stops planned in Abilene and Wichita.

C-SPAN, which stands for the Cable-Satellite Public Affairs Network, first went on the air in 1979 with the broadcast of a speech by then-congressman Al Gore. Because Cox Communications provides C-SPAN for the cable industry, Cox representatives will be at the bus to promote the network and its differences from other news networks, said Sarah Kaufmann, Cox Communications public affairs manager.

Cox representatives asked C-SPAN to visit Topeka, Wichita and Manhattan, Kaufmann said. Most likely, students and other people on the bus will not be on television today, she said.

"It's more of an educational experience than being on TV," Kaufmann said.

C-SPAN also has received several requests from cable affiliates, he said.

"It really allows them to visit our bus, learn about C-SPAN and our programming and how it's used in the classroom," Neiderer said.

BETTY | Latina image presentation part of Heritage Month

"The program is just a big wink with the audience," said Elizabeth Dodd, professor of creative writing and literature. "They claim the characters are ugly, but obviously there's some physical beauty to them on screen."

Han Yu, associate professor of English, said she thought "Betty's" attractiveness was used to illustrate the physical differences between modern perceptions of beauty.

"I think the whole show is dichotomizing what is beautiful and what is ugly," Yu said.

A song by Jason Mraz, "The Beauty in Ugly," was the other metaphor González used to express the opinion that "Betty" should be less sweet and have more attitude in the seasons to come, since she made many personal sacrifices for the benefit of those around her in the first two seasons.

"For the sake of your heart and all you should own your name, and stand up tall/get real/and see the beauty of ugly," Mraz sang.

Sautéing," Chris Roerden, author of the nonfiction book, "Don't Murder Your Mystery: 24 Fiction-Writing Techniques to Save Your Manuscript from Turning up D.O.A.," and Cheryl Collins, director of the Riley County Historical Museum.

Marolyn Caldwell, chair of the GMMC committee, said this year's conclave will be smaller than others, because it is held the same weekend as another mystery-writing convention called Bouchercon. She said they could not reschedule because of the K-State football games, it was not possible.

"We are competing with the largest mystery convention in the world," Caldwell said.

The convention is geared toward small-town mystery novels, and Caldwell said they are trying to bring in lots of readers and writers — especially students.

"This is how you really break into the business; you have to go to the conventions," Caldwell said.

Several of the programs will be offered at discount prices to students, Caldwell said. For example, Sunday morning, Chris Roerden will present on "Preventing Quick Rejection," and students will get $15 off the $30 registration fee.

"If anyone wants to be a serious writer, that's the way to do it," Caldwell said. "She knows all about the publishing business."

For the event, Caldwell said Claflin Books and Copies will set up a room where the public can purchase the authors' books for signing.

Felisa Osburn, recording secretary on the GMMC committee, said she is excited to meet the authors and try all the food, and she said the conclave is not always geared toward writers. "I go as a mystery book fan and not a writer."

She said though this year's conclave will be small, they have reached their goal of 50 people and almost doubled that for the dinner Saturday night.

Friday will feature a presentation by Smily and Finkelstein of "Metaphysics, Magic and Things that Go Bump in Books." Attending the presentation in Hale Library costs $30, but students will pay a discounted price of $15, according to the Web site.

Saturday will be full of presentations and panels from various topics like, "Weaving Your Passions into Your Plots," and "Mystery in History — How Authentic Should It Be?" All presentations will be held in various rooms at the Holiday Inn and is included in the registration package.

There will be a banquet Saturday night featuring entrees found in Davidson's mystery novels, with Davidson as the guest of honor.

Sunday will feature more panels and presentations as well as a tour of the Wolf House Museum.

HASKIN | '98 K-State, Texas game sets precedent

was a rebuilding year by Texas' standards.

"Williams may have been more valuable just because Texas wasn't as loaded as K-State," Haskin said. "The lopsided nature of K-State's (48-7) win over Texas certainly suggests that there was a talent disparity."

When Texas arrived in Manhattan to play the No. 5 Wildcats for the third game of the year, Williams was rushing for nearly 200 yards per game. Against UCLA, the No. 6 team in the nation, he ran for 160 yards and three touchdowns.

He had no such luck against K-State. Williams finished with 43 yards on 25 carries with his longest gain of the day going for seven yards.

In the early years of the Big 12, teams preferred to run the ball mercilessly and often did not have much of a backup plan if that didn't work. On this day, after falling behind 35-0 at halftime, Texas was forced to throw the ball 37 times, which resulted in a pair of interceptions and many incompletions.

"Some of what Kansas State did defensively affected what offenses do today with spreading out the field and taking away your ability to load the box and guard against the run," Haskin said. "You don't see some of the run plays that you once did in college football."

K-State's dominant performance was the beginning of a competitive series with one of the nation's most storied programs. Since the inception of the Big 12, K-State holds a 3-2 record against the Longhorns.

"When Texas comes in for the first time, you know you're part of something different," Haskin said. "It was a big deal to beat Texas. It was a big deal just for Texas to come to K-State. I think throughout this series, Kansas State hasn't backed down. It's become a pretty good series."

Man charged with rape

By Elise Podhajsky
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A Junction City man was charged with two counts of rape Wednesday.

Michael Antonio Garcia, 215 W. 10th St., Junction City, allegedly raped a 13-year-old girl, according to police.

The first rape allegedly occurred at the EconoLodge in the northeast part of Manhattan on June 9, the second earlier in the year in a residence near the Aggieville area, according to Lt. Kurt Moldrup of the Riley County Police Department.

Moldrup said the act was consensual; however, because the victim is under the age of 15, she is presumably not mature enough to make a consensual decision and the act is considered rape.

The incidents were reported by a relative of the victim, and Garcia has been confined on $50,000 bail.

C-SPAN interviews students

By Adrienne DeWeese
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A piece of Washington, D.C., made a stop at K-State to educate students and faculty about nonpartisan news coverage Thursday afternoon.

C-SPAN's Campaign 2008 Bus provided information about the network through information about critical viewing and media literacy.

About 200 K-State students and faculty members took 15-minute tours of the bus, Neiderer said. C-SPAN also interviewed the following students about their involvement with different 2008 presidential campaigns: Chuck Armstrong, senior in mass communications; Jeannette Rikli, junior in pre-journalism and mass communications; and Peter Lehardt, senior in engineering.

"Through our travels, we try to get opinions from students," Neiderer said.

Neiderer said it is not guaranteed the students' interviews will air on C-SPAN, but they might be streamed on the network's Web site.

The 2008 presidential campaign is the first election in 50 years in which an incumbent president or vice president is not running, Neiderer said.

"It is a very diverse field," he said. "This is our Olympics."

The bus is in Abilene, Kan., today with a C-SPAN film crew. The network will have a live broadcast from 7-9 p.m. at the Eisenhower Presidential Center for the fourth program of its "Presidential Libraries: History Uncovered" series.

Campus group finds ways to reuse items creatively

By Kristin Hodges
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The earth is rejoicing because today is Green Consumer Day.

Green Consumer Day is a day for recognizing the effect consumerism has on the environment, according to the EduGreen Web site, a Web site that educates youth about the environment.

The three R's that should be practiced to produce less waste and protect the environment are reduce, reuse and recycle. While all three are important, there are several items students need to reuse to cut down on resource use.

REUSE BEFORE RECYCLE

Ben Champion, instructor of geography, said reusing materials instead of recycling them helps avoid creating wastes from the processes of recycling.

"Recycling is often very resource-intensive," he said, "and it is also logistically complex. It is, therefore, pretty wasteful."

Champion said society uses a lot of products that derive from basic natural resources. He gave the example of drinking tap water that comes from local reservoirs, and drinking bottled water that comes from a different locale and its effects on water use throughout the world.

"The production of a lot of the goods we do consume is also energy and resource-intensive," he said. "The inputs and outputs of those processes can be very concerning in air and water pollution."

According to the Environmental Protection Agency's Web site, reusing items by repairing them, donating them or selling them helps reduce waste and is "even better than recycling because the item does not need to be reprocessed before it can be used again."

PROJECT IDEAS

K-State's Students for Environmental Action members think of creative ways to reuse everyday items, and sometimes they sell them for fundraising events.

Pam Wittman, SEA secretary, said the organization thinks of different craft ideas each semester.

Wittman, a junior in finance, said many items still can be used for different purposes rather than being thrown away — it just takes creativity and adaptability with the original products. This helps the consumer save money by not needing to buy more products.

"You are doing both you and the environment a favor," she said.

The members have reused everyday materials to make objects like magnets out of bottle caps and pictures out of magazines.

She said the magnets are made by using Modge Podge to attach the pictures to the bottle caps, and then hot glue is used to attach the magnets to the bottle caps.

"It's reusing items to make cool things," she said.

Wittman said the group has made purses and bags from plastic bags from grocery stores. She said the plastic sacks were cut into long strips and crocheted to make the accessories.

Rylan Ortiz, senior in electrical engineering and a member of SEA, he said the most popular project the group has made is recycled notebooks.

Ortiz said 8-1/2 by 11 inches of cardboard from cereal or beer boxes are used for the front and back cover of the notebook. Then the group gets recycled paper from the computer labs on campus and uses the unused side of the sheets of paper to fill the notebook. He said the members use about 80 sheets for each notebook.

Next, he said they use a heavy-duty stapler and staple along the seam of the cardboard.

"A trick is to cut down the already folded section an inch from the main cover over into smaller area," he said.

To make the cover look nicer, he said

Class discusses how 'going green' can be efficient, save money

By Mark Wampler
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

We have to walk lightly on the planet. As consumers, maybe we could try to not buy so much, a Manhattan resident said.

Karen McCulloh, a former city commissioner and former member of the Riley County Solid Waste Committee, discussed environmental issues and resolutions with Manhattan residents at the "It's So Easy Being Green" UFM class last night.

The class met Thursday night, fittingly, in the UFM's newly remodeled solar greenhouse.

"This new building is actually old technology," McCulloh said, pointing to the solar panels. "These panels just have bean-bag type beans in them."

She explained how during the daytime, the windows let the sun in, and at night the panels turn so the beans can keep the heat in.

"No matter how cold it gets outside, the building is maintained at 55 or 60 degrees," she said.

The class discussed issues they said were not benefiting the community and the world. Things like store packaging, materialism, global warming, energy and society's food choices were the main items discussed.

Kate Wallace, fifth-year student in business, said there are many ways students can get involved to help protect the environment.

"I don't think students realize how easy it is," she said.

Wallace said she once had a Green Party and amazed her guests with the keg that was bought by using the money saved from recycling cans during the school year.

"Once it becomes a part of your lifestyle, it just becomes kind of a habit," she said.

Morgan Leiker, senior in public relations, said she never paid attention to environmental issues until she saw her roommate recycle.

"You don't realize the little things that can make a big difference," she said. "I didn't realize all that could be recycled, and I started thinking, 'well, what else can I do?'"

The members of the class also discussed what every person could do to help "steer the ship back in the right direction," as McCulloh said, referring to the nation's current destructive path.

One thing the class suggested is for consumers to watch the everyday items they buy.

"You can talk with your money," McCulloh said, holding up the Co-Op America Quarterly, a magazine that discusses "economic action for a just planet."

Wagner encourages student senators to contact legislature

Staff Reports
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Student Body President Matt Wagner encouraged student senators to contact their representatives in the Kansas Legislature during a Student Governing Association meeting Thursday night.

Wagner asked student senators to lobby for deferred maintenance funds and to keep the lines of communication open with those in the legislature.

Nick Piper, student senate chair said senate will approach the issue of deferred maintenance the same way as they have previously.

"We're just gonna try and have the same plan of attack we had last year, communicating with state legislators," Piper said.

The SGA meeting lasted for just more than an hour.

Of the legislation on the agenda, the Senate sent a bill to a committee to add two new articles which reinstated the review process of the Kansas State Honor System Constitution and to change its name to the Kansas State University Honor and Integrity System Constitution.

The senate unanimously approved allocations for two different student organizations. The Apostolic Christian Church Youth Group was allocated $500 and the Navigators $1,000, both for travel expenses.

They also unanimously approved the appointments of 10 students, six senators and four interns to be the SGA ambassadors.

Also, the senate introduced a bill to create a special committee regarding a community-service project sponsored by the senate.

Program to help students prevent conflicts with neighbors

By Mark Wampler
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Noise complaints brought local neighborhood residents and college students together for a party.

On Sept. 16, the Good Neighbor Program, recently implemented by the Student Governing Association and members of the Manhattan community, had the first of several community events with an ice cream social in three specific neighborhoods the program is targeting.

"We are still in the planning stages for what we want the full-scale program to be, but so far it's going really well," said Lydia Peele, student body vice president and senior in mathematics education.

Moriah Wagner, student coordinator for the program and senior in women's studies, said the program started with the idea of reducing conflicts by promoting closer relationships between students and their neighbors.

The program's research began by working closely with the City of Manhattan, the neighborhood associations, the Chamber of Commerce and the Riley County Police Department to determine living conditions in specific areas.

"By working with these organizations we get a feel for what's going on in the neighborhoods - that's how we pick and choose where we want to target," Wagner said.

Brian Williams, city representative for the project, said the program is designed to "get people out to know one another and hopefully fix situations without having compliance to some type of law."

Williams said he is optimistic about the turnout of the first Good Neighbors event.

"We are hoping some of the relationships that were made during the ice cream social will be developed in order to reduce potential conflicts," he said.

Williams said the conflicts were usually nuisance reports related to trash and noise.

Wagner, reading from the program's literature, said, "The idea for the program comes from the reality that universities are closely tied with the sister town and neighborhoods that make up their physical setting," she said.

Wagner said she feels that giving people the opportunity to talk to each other makes for much better circumstances.

"It's important to build good relationships with K-State students and current residents so that we can continue to be good neighbors to the actual City of Manhattan," Wagner said.

Peele said she agrees that the relationships need to be developed.

"We really feel that it is important for the attitude of the family of K-State to go beyond the campus," she said.

The Good Neighbor Program is made up of members of community and student government as well as student and community volunteers. The group in charge of planning the events is a task force of about 14 people. Williams said one of the best things about the program is its student leadership.

"We envisioned this from the beginning as a student-led initiative," he said. "What student is going to want to come to a meeting and hear a city commissioner saying we have a problem?"

Aside from the big community events, Wagner said the program works by having a student representative and a current resident representing the program in each of the targeted areas.

"We also work closely with the presidents of the neighborhoods," Wagner said.

She stressed the importance of everyone in the city working together.

"We're hoping that this program will be a continual and very communal effort," Wagner said. "What we're trying to do this semester is to build that foundation."

As far as the expansion of the program goes, Wagner said next semester they are hoping to add three more neighborhoods to the program and eventually add representatives to all 21 neighborhoods that they have divided the city into.

"The program is not just to reduce the complaints but to reduce the issues," he said. "And this can happen when people develop relationships."

Specific areas targeted by the program include the 900 block of Vattier Street, the 1800 block of Fairchild Street and the 700 block of Thurston Street.

Fourum is back

The Fourum has been resurrected. After months of endless begging and pleading from students, we've realized the forum is something our readers value and look forward to reading every day. As an editorial staff, we've decided it's time to bring back this section to give our readers another voice in the Collegian.

THE FOURUM
(785) 395-4444

The Campus Fourum is the Collegian's anonymous call-in system. The Fourum is edited to eliminate vulgar, racist, obscene and libelous comments. The comments are not the opinion of the Collegian nor are they endorsed by the editorial staff.

Here are some tips for calling the Collegian's Campus Fourum:

Keep your opinion based on issues, not personalities or personal vendettas.

Keep it short. There is only time for about two or three short sentences.

Speak clearly. If you cannot be understood, then you will not be printed.

The Collegian will try to offer as many diverse opinions as possible, so be sure to put an interesting spin on your comments.

Do not give too much background on the issue. Immediately state your stance or plan of action.

Be honest. We do not ask for your name, nor do we use caller ID to see who comments are coming from. Your opinion in completely anonymous.

To submit comments, call (785) 395-4444.

When we checked the Fourum voicemail, here's what we found. All are examples of acceptable comments.

Oh my God, Fourum, you're alive.

Ron Prince, I'm so proud of you guys. I'm really looking forward to the rest of the season. Good luck.

I wish they would put a block on Facebook on the computers in the library, so I could actually get on one sometime.

I hate the Fourum.

'Read my lips' redux

Bush increases taxes, hurts citizens just like his father did

Standing behind the podium at the 1988 Republican National Convention, former President Bush delivered a key speech line, which later became the downfall of his presidency.

"...my opponent won't rule out raising taxes. But I will. And the Congress will push me to raise taxes and I'll say no. And they'll push, and I'll say no, and they'll push again, and I'll say, to them, read my lips: no new taxes."

By September 1990, Bush Sr. signed the tax increases into effect, dropping his approval ratings by 20 percent almost overnight.

Fourteen years later, the junior Bush stated he would not raise Social Security tax rates.

According to CNNmoney.com, President Bush said on Dec. 9, 2004, "We will not raise payroll taxes to solve this problem."

An important issue during the 2004 election was the struggling Social Security program and how to fix this waste of resources as the baby-boomer generation nears retirement.

President Bush's plan was to establish "personal savings accounts" which would allow people to manage their own retirement funds; the goal was to allow people to make money on their investment. According to the Federal Reserve Bank of San Francisco, those born after 1975 earn a negative rate of return.

Like his father, President Bush has made the same promise to the American people and is going back on his word. According to the Associated Press, the Bush Administration released a statement Sept. 24, 2007, which said, "Social Security can be made permanently solvent only by reducing the present value of scheduled benefits and/or increasing the present value of scheduled tax increases ... only these changes can restore solvency permanently."

Plain and simple, the Bush administration sees the only option we have to fix the Social Security program is to cut back on benefits or increase taxes.

Unfortunately, Republicans in Congress dragged their feet from 2004 through 2006, and we are stuck with a Democratic Congress that won't cut benefits, leaving the option to increase taxes as the only one they will consider.

President Bush was right when he expressed his feelings and the feelings of many U.S. citizens that the Social Security program is in shambles, but a tax increase only hurts American families.

According to the Social Security Online Web site, the current Social Security tax rate is 12.4 percent on yearly income up to $97,500, half paid by the employee and half by the employer.

Self-employed individuals are forced to shoulder the whole burden of Social Security tax.

Each year an employee can lose up to $6,045 from their paycheck without seeing a dime.

Add in what an employer has to pay to the government instead of paying the employee directly and an individual could lose up to $12,090 a year.

When Uncle Sam comes knocking on April 15 each year, citizens are double taxed on income they never saw, which was stolen by Social Security program when paying their yearly income taxes.

"Investment" in a program with a negative return is irrational. Throwing more money into a system does not make the program work - it only means more money is lost.

President Bush has become a lame duck president since the 2006 election.

But that doesn't mean he should follow his father's lead and contribute more financial pressures to the citizens struggling to make ends meet.

World should see positive effects Russian youth groups have

The grounds of the camp were decorated with 6-foot plywood posters of Russian President Vladimir Putin's political opponents, their heads placed on female bodies lounged in provocative positions. The 10,000 youths in attendance, ranging in age from 14 to 28, attended classes on hand-to-hand combat, leadership and Christian missionaries.

Many of the campers wore faded jeans and T-shirts, just like students on a Kansas college campus, but some wore uniforms. Camouflage clothes were provided to some, and others wore the faded brown uniforms of their fathers and grandfathers. Perhaps to symbolize rebirth or to prove to each other and the Western world that Russia could be great again.

The campers were only a fraction of the movement; on July 8, the New York Times reported the movement of youths could be up to 200,000 members. Their movement is called the "Nashi," meaning in Russian, "Ours."

Created along with a handful of other youth organizations by President Putin, the Nashi is Russia's strongest and best-funded teenage movement. Members are taught to support one another, abstain from alcohol, smoking, cursing, and according to USA Today, birth control.

Other main points are to show respect toward World War II veterans, and most importantly, do whatever is necessary to ensure the success of their benefactor. This is accomplished in both traditional and nontraditional ways.

On April 27, the Estonian government removed a statue of a World War II Soviet soldier from the capital's main square. According to Newsweek, within hours, massive amounts of spam brought government Web sites, banks, online news pages and much of the Baltic nation's Internet economy to a screeching halt.

When the Estonians tried to move the statue, a Nashi-led mob shut down the highway and attacked the Estonian ambassador's guards. The Kremlin, which funds the Nashi, denies any involvement.

This is not the only organization like this in Russia today. In its 85 regions, there are groups like the Youth Guard - a group provided for by United Russia - and a pro-Putin political group called the Grigorevsky. The Russian Orthodox Church is associated with the Grigorevsky. Their main stance is to prevent immigration. These are not the Boy Scouts; most of them gladly accept young women into their ranks. These youth groups are more likened to Boy Scouts on meth.

Putin recently has made several comments and open verbal attacks on the integrity of the United States and its political workings.

In early May the Denver Post said Putin described us as posing "new threats, as during the time of the Third Reich." These students seem to follow Putin as if he were a God.

Though this might seem to pose a threat to us, in the grand scheme of things, is it really "bad?" Can an organization that steadily improves its members physically and through leadership training be condemned?

The Nashi encourages these youths to support a healthy lifestyle. It offers them what must seem like a clear path out of the struggles of Russian existence.

Russia has been dawdling for years; its people are divided by poor leadership and corruption. Putin might be harsh, and he might use under-the-table tactics, but for these youths, he has provided hope, unity, and perhaps most importantly, a purpose.

Young French pianist to perform at McCain

By Adrienne DeWeese
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Jean-Frédéric Neuburger started playing piano at age eight.

By age 10, he knew he wanted to play professionally for the rest of his life.

Neuburger, 20, made his New York debut at Carnegie's Zankel Hall in November 2006. He will perform for the first time in McCain Auditorium as part of the McCain Performance Series.

"(Kansas) is a very calm place," Neuburger, who originally is from Paris, said. "It's given an impression of big space."

In 2000, Neuburger entered the Conservatoire National Supérieur de Musique et de Danse de Paris, also known as the Conservatoire de Paris. He said he also has studied with Russian, French and Japanese pianists.

"All the young pianists try to see a lot of teachers so they can choose what they want to do, what they don't want to do, so I tried to do the same," said Neuburger, who practices about six hours each day.

While tonight's program features composers like Frédéric Chopin and Franz Liszt, Neuburger said he will start performing more pieces by Ludwig van Beethoven next year. Neuburger refused to choose a favorite composer and said he has between six to eight favorites.

"The hearer can have a favorite composer of pieces, but for the player, it's too difficult to choose," Neuburger said.

When selecting songs for his programs, Neuburger said he chooses songs that are well directed and go together. The songs are not necessarily in the same style, but they are in the same spirit of work, he said.

"This is a quite mystique program because the sonata is a big piece and very long with a lot of effect of silence and a large place of meditation," he said of tonight's program. "It's not a light program this time."

Neuburger said classical pieces are longer than traditional three-minute song.

"You cannot find the same pleasure the first several minutes," Neuburger said. "You will find it after 10, 20 minutes after you find out how it is written and well done by the composer."

Robert Edwards, emeritus professor of music, will present the pre-performance lecture at 6:30 p.m. today in McCain 204. His lecture will provide information about the songs on Neuburger's program.

Neuburger provided discussion about his experiences as a professional musician during master classes for piano performance majors and music students on Thursday in All Faiths Chapel. He also is available to talk with audience members after his performance tonight.

Todd Holmberg, McCain executive director, said Neuburger's program is perfect for those interested in the Romantic Period.

"There are lots of extremes and tone colors," Holmberg said of the program's Chopin and Liszt songs. "They actually contrast with Bach, who is one of the most prolific composers of all time."

Tonight's performance will provide audience members with a closer view of a solo pianist, Holmberg said.

"I think that students should see this because this is an individual soloist's recital," he said. "It's our mission to give students and community members these very live and intimate connections."

Neuburger is the 10th Young Concert Artists' musician to perform as part of the McCain Performance Series since 1999. Young Concert Artists, founded in 1961, is a professional organization that helps start the careers of young international musicians. Neuburger is one of seven pianists on the Young Concert Artists' roster.

Thomas Jackson, McCain marketing and development director, said tonight's performance is an opportunity to see Neuburger while he still is able to have residencies.

"It's the opportunity for students, faculty and staff to see a really good pianist," Jackson said. "In time, we often do the 'Where are they?' and who knows - Jean-Frédéric could be the next Chopin."

More than 9 schools visit for 'encuentro'

"Spanish is where my heart is."

Students and faculty members applauded the statement from Mirta Chavez, Alianza president, during the first Midwest Hispanic American Leadership Organization encuentro Thursday.

The encuentro, - which means "gathering" - was a part of K-State's Hispanic Heritage Month celebration. Rodolfo Arévalo, Eastern Washington University president, presented the keynote speech "Education is the Way" Thursday morning at the K-State Student Union Ballroom.

"My experience as I look at higher education today is that life and businesses are changing rapidly, and you have to learn how to think," Arévalo said. "You aren't going to be able to do a job if you don't have the ability to be flexible and think."

Arévalo said his parents emigrated from Mexico to Texas in the late 1920s or early 1930s and worked as migrant farmers. He said he had six brothers and one sister, and Arévalo's family traveled to states like Washington, Idaho, and Michigan to pick crops.

His father was an organized man who planned how much money they needed to survive and picked crops based on that amount, Arévalo said. Arévalo also said his father provided the family with incentives like extra money or rest in the car if they picked more crops than they were assigned.

"The goal-setting was very important because from that I brought a work ethic where I went," Arévalo said.

Though working was important for the family to survive, he said his parents made sure he enrolled in and attended school.

He said his first experience of failure occurred when he flunked the first grade. Arévalo said he had to learn to overcome the failure to succeed.

While Arévalo was a senior in high school, he said he went to the counselor to discuss college plans, and the counselor told him that he should just get a job because he was not college material.

He said because of the comments he received he continued to look at colleges and ended up attending the closest college to him, where he was admitted and received a scholarship.

Because of his failure in first grade and because of his age, he was two years behind the average high-school student who was graduating and that was the driving force that encouraged him to not give up and succeed.

Arévalo said he earned his bachelor's degree in three years and opened an accounting firm in Texas. He learned, though, that he did not like the accounting business and decided to get his master's degree and become a public administrator.

At 26, Arévalo said he was named the associate dean of students at the University of Texas. After his boss was promoted, Arévalo said, his boss told him he was qualified for the position but the administration was not ready to hire a Hispanic for the job.

Moving on to several other locations, Arévalo said he was offered a job at Fort Hays State University and accepted the position of Provost of Academic Affairs. He took the job because he previously had worked in California at a school that had a significant minority population and wanted to see if his skills were transferable in a predominately white institution.

Rodolfo Arévalo, President of Eastern Washington University and keynote speaker of The First Midwest H.A.L.O. Encuentro, speaks in the K-State Student Union Ballroom Thursday morning.

"I was the first Hispanic and first minority provost in the state of Kansas and for Fort Hays," Arévalo said.

Students from the H.A.L.O. program at Fort Hays State University, Emporia State University, Barton County Community College, Garden City Community College, Lyons High School, Great Bend High School, Seward County, Hutchinson Community College and the University of Kansas attended the encuentro.

Tania Marines, freshman in anthropology, said she thinks it is time to care about education among Hispanics and to promote education to the Hispanic community for the future.

"We need to start standing up to fight for rights to gain a better education," Marines said.

Myra Gordon, Diversity and Dual Career Development

associate provost, said she was pleased the encuentro's turnout exceeded her expectations. She also said she wants to help increase diversity enrollment in the university.

"We have only just begun with the diversity program here and are so proud of the program," Gordon said.

The Mariachi Campanas de America provided entertainment for the encuentro.

The crowd cheered as the mariachi band entered the room and stayed interactive by clapping during various songs. During one song, a woman in the mariachi group walked through the tables and sang to a young man she pulled from a table. The band, with its powerful voices, had audience members standing, clapping and cheering for more.

"I think it is meaningful and touching for K-State students to have the time to embrace this performance," said Zelia Z. Wiley, assistant dean and director of diversity programs.

Rowers to start season in Iowa

The K-State women's rowing team will hit the water for the first time this fall at the Head of the Des Moines regatta Saturday.

It will be K-State's first competition since the Wildcats won the Central Region crown in the Novice Eight Grand Final at the NCAA Central/South Region Sprints last season. It was K-State's first appearance in the Grand Finals of the regional regatta.

K-State will send seven boats to the Head of the Des Moines, a 2.85-mile race sponsored by the Des Moines Rowing Club.

Other teams in the field include Drake, Iowa State, Missouri, Nebraska, Kansas and Tulsa.

"We always look forward to the first race of the year," coach Pat Sweeney said.

"It's a good time to break up the training a bit and have some fun."

"It is also an exciting time as the novices are competing for their first time ever. You never know what you will get out of their first race experience."

Invitational to feature 4 teams from Big 12

The K-State women's golf team has a history of success on its home course.

K-State's Helene Robert won the individual title at the 2005 Marilyn Smith/Sunflower Invitational, and K-State placed first as a team in 2003.

The Wildcats will look to continue the trend when 12 teams visit Colbert Hills Golf Course for the 2007 Sunflower Invitational on Monday and Tuesday.

The field includes three other Big 12 Conference teams — Kansas, Missouri and Nebraska — as well as Wichita State, Southern Mississippi and Texas State, the team that edged the Wildcats at the Chip-N-Club Invitational.

K-State holds a 6-4 record against the field.

The tournament begins with 36 holes Monday and concludes with Tuesday's final 18.

The Wildcats' five-player team will consist of seniors Michelle Regan, Kali Quick, and Hailey Mireles, and sophomores Abbi Sunner and Morgan Moon.

Freshmen Emily and Elise Houtz will play as individuals, along with junior Krista Nelson.

The K-State Water Ski team uses Tuttle Creek Reservoir as a practice facility. The team finished 14th out of 21 teams at the Great Plains Conference and failed to qualify for Midwest Regionals.

Veterans hope to guide younger skiers

By Andy Nelson
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

At 1:30 Monday morning as narcoleptic viewers were zoned in to reruns of The Fresh Prince of Bel Air on Nick at Nite, the K-State Water Ski team was rolling into town ending two days of intense competition and a 10-hour ride back to Manhattan from Wilmington, Ill.

After finishing 14th out of 21 teams at the Great Plains Conference Tournament and failing to move on to the Midwest Regionals, many might wonder if the lengthy road trip was worth it. To the skiers on the team, the answer is simply yes.

The tournament gave members of the team an excuse to do something they are passionate about.

Nate Cless, senior in geology and president of the water ski team, has been water skiing for almost as long as he can remember. For Cless this high-profile tournament gave him a couple of reasons to dawn his water skis.

"I'm a competitive guy so I like the competition factor, but it's more for fun," said Cless.

While fun and a competitive spirit drives many on the team, time at practices and competitions afford many in this close-knit group the opportunity simply to enjoy each other's company.

"There isn't a single person that I don't get along with," said Lia Frankovic, senior in kinesiology and women's team captain. "It's not just going out to the lake for practice; you're also going to hang out with friends."

Although the team might have enjoyed themselves, failure to move on at the conference tournament meant that its season had come to an abrupt end. One of the key factors for the team's short season might have been because of a lack of skiing knowledge.

"We had a lot of inexperienced skiers skiing at a major tournament for the very first time," said Cless.

Last season the team saw relative success and missed out on going to Nationals by one place. A lack of retention is partly to blame for the inexperience on the team this season. Out of 25 skiers from last year's squad only five returned for this season, leaving the team with little experience.

Cless said one of the hurdles in rebuilding the team is getting the younger skiers to become proficient in all three events that are common at every tournament.

In the jump event, skiers are pulled at speeds reaching 32 mph over a ramp and propelled up to 70 feet through the air. To many on the team, this experience is like none other, but it also can be quite intimidating for beginning skiers. Getting people to take the plunge can be difficult at first.

"It's initially scary and then once you do it you realize how fun it is and it's an adrenaline rush,"

Fritz asks liberos to step up for Texas A&M match-up

By Jonathan Potter
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State volleyball team has lost just three matches this season, but coach Suzie Fritz is still not satisfied.

Fritz said she felt her team was outworked defensively against Oklahoma and Colorado and called on her senior liberos, Lauren Rosenthal and Angie Lastra, to step up.

"We've been all over them about just making greater effort, just greater exceptional effort for plays," Fritz said.

"I felt like Oklahoma made greater effort defensively. I felt like Colorado made greater effort. So we've kind of gone back to the drawing board with that and have tried to emphasize that a bit more with our team."

K-State's defense will have another chance to improve when the No. 18 Wildcats (12-3, 4-1 Big 12 Conference) challenge Texas A&M (12-3, 2-3) at 6:30 tonight at the Ferrell Center in College Station, Texas.

Lastra, who leads the team with 221 digs, said the Wildcats showed improvement in Wednesday's 3-0 sweep of Missouri.

"We're going for every ball," Lastra said. "In fact, I think we're battling for every touch."

Offensively, K-State didn't have much trouble against the Tigers. Junior outside hitter Rita Liliom led the team with 15 kills and four service aces.

Fritz said she'll continue coaching an aggressive service game as Big 12 play continues.

"If we're going to make errors, we're going to make them going for it," Fritz said. "We have to play that way."

It's the only way over time you can be successful in the league."

Texas A&M did not lose a match during the pre-season, but Big 12 Conference play has been tougher for the Aggies. They picked up their first Big 12 road win Wednesday, sweeping Baylor 30-27, 30-24 and 30-24.

Jillian Phillips led Texas A&M with 11 kills on 42 percent hitting.

Four players on the Aggies' roster have recorded more than 100 kills this season, and Phillips has tallied 97.

KC Chiefs on track for success

Dwayne Bowe was up in the air. The defender was in perfect position. The rookie wide receiver hadn't done anything to make anyone believe he was capable of making that type of catch.

RYNE WITT

But a funny thing happened at Arrowhead Stadium on Sunday. Two funny things, actually.

Bowe caught the ball, and the Chiefs won the game.

When Bowe made that catch, the first words out of my mouth were, "That was sick." I still don't know how he got his feet in bounds for the touchdown.

I'll be the first to tell you that I am not a Chiefs fan, and I wasn't too impressed when the Chiefs drafted Bowe. I hadn't heard much about him, and he wasn't as flashy as other receivers in the draft.

Then Bowe showed up late to training camp. I don't think many people thought he was going to make an effect in the NFL as a rookie.

Of course, the last time I had a bad feeling about a Kansas City draft pick was when the Chiefs drafted Larry Johnson, and we all know how that turned out.

On Sunday, Bowe stepped up his game when his team needed a playmaker. He provided a spark for a sputtering offense.

To be honest, I couldn't stay awake during the first two Chiefs games this year. They were boring, so I just went and took a mid-afternoon nap. I would wake up and ask the Chiefs' score. I guessed that they lost, but I wanted to know anyway.

Last Sunday, Bowe's performance was exciting enough to make me forego my afternoon snooze.

It seems the Chiefs have found a new game plan: pass the ball to Bowe and get the defense to back off the line of scrimmage, which will open up running lanes for Johnson.

On the Chiefs' touchdown drive, quarterback Damon Huard threw the ball all over the field, which opened up the running game. It was refreshing to see Johnson running in the open field, even if his longest run was called back by a penalty.

Drafting Bowe now looks like a genius move. The Chiefs have two young skill players — Bowe and Johnson — who can be building blocks for the future. Sort of like the Cowboys' dynasty, minus the superstar quarterback.

All the Chiefs need to do next year is draft a franchise quarterback (Brodie Croyle is not the future) and work on that line.

Yes, coach Herm Edwards also has to open things up a bit offensively, but he is gathering the right parts to do that. The Chiefs could be scary-good in the future.

K-State cross country runners to face teams from 4 conferences at Roy Griak Invitational

By Wendy Haun
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Five other Big 12 Conference teams await the K-State cross-country team in St. Paul, Minn., Saturday at the Roy Griak Invitational.

K-State already has faced two of the teams this season — Nebraska and Kansas — but will see Iowa State, Missouri and Oklahoma for the first time this season.

"It's a significant step up," coach Michael Smith said. "We're climbing the ladder two or three rungs here, instead of the one-rung climb we've been doing. This meet and then pre-national meet is an increase in the level of competition, and then the Big 12 meet takes it up even more."

"This is the competitive part of the year. This is when it counts. We expect to perform at a higher level for the next three or four levels."

In addition to the other Big 12 teams, this meet will feature several teams from the Big Ten Conference, the Pacific-10 Conference and the Western Athletic Conference.

For the second consecutive meet, the women will run a 6K and the men will run an 8K.

Smith said the upperclassmen on both the men's and the women's sides have been concentrating on speed instead of distance.

"The women did what we expected them to do," he said. "The younger women, I thought, were too tentative. On the men's side, it's a huge adjustment from 5Ks in high school to 8Ks in college. Our older guys ran to their capabilities. The more experienced kids aren't dealing with the distance at all. They're dealing with getting faster."

Junior Alex Umberger, whose best finish was third at the KU Dual, agreed the distance isn't an issue for the upperclassmen.

"Danny (Schneider) and myself and Colin Swaney, we've been through this," Umberger said. "The younger guys don't know what to expect. I think they're realizing that it's going to take maybe a whole year to get used to the distance."

"So far, they've been handling the workouts that we do and the longer runs. I think sooner or later, they'll see results and that'll definitely motivate them."

This weekend's meet will be the second-to-last race before the conference meet. Next weekend, the Wildcats will be at the pre-NCAA meet in Terre Haute, Ind.

"It'll be good for us to see where we are as a team and for each of us to see where we are personally," Umberger said. "In the conference, I need to look for some guys that I can run with and hopefully run with them at this meet. Hopefully, this meet and the next one will give us an overview of what to expect at the Big 12."

The K-State cross country team will face five Big 12 Conference teams at Saturday's Roy Griak Invitational in St. Paul, Minn.

THEATER PROFILE

The Purple Masque Theatre is in Memorial Stadium, and the small size of the theater offers opportunities for the performers and audience members to interact. The show "Down the Road" will be presented Oct. 4 - 6.

Purple Masque a learning environment for students

By Sarah Burford
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

It is easy to find Aggieville-goers strolling toward their favorite bars, stay-at-homers curled up with their favorite books and others pondering ways to spend their precious hours of freedom on a weekend evening. Most would never think of spending a night out beneath Memorial Stadium.

Across from the K-State Student Union's information booth, under East Stadium's gaping archway, through a painted black door, down a hallway covered in carpet, and past a few mismatched couches, tucked away like a secret hideout, is a stage. This is the Purple Masque Theatre, where students run the show.

Before the Purple Masque was created, Memorial Stadium was still the home of K-State football, and the theater was its locker room, said Katie Meadows, associate marketing director for K-State Theater. Memorial Stadium also provided housing for some athletic teams.

The athletes lived above the locker room in what used to be dorm rooms in the side of the stadium, said John Richards, senior in theater and psychology.

The Purple Masque gives students hands-on experience in designing sets, acting, directing, managing lights and everything else that goes into a production. Each performance held there is completely student-run, compared to productions in Nichols Hall, which are run by faculty, Meadows said.

"There's only so much you can learn in the classroom," Meadows said. "You just have to jump in and do it."

And jump in, they have. Richards is directing the upcoming show "Down the Road," which tells the story of a husband and wife who interview a serial killer for their novel and provoke the audience to question the couple's ethics. The show will be presented Oct. 4-6.

Kate Anderson, director of theater, said the Purple Masque is "absolutely essential" to the theater department. Most plays performed at the Purple Masque are students' original works. Graduate students often will use their Purple Masque productions as their theses.

"It's a place where we get to work together as colleagues with the support of the faculty," she said.

The Purple Masque offers opportunities for people to gain experience. The Ebony Theater, an organization within the theater department that performs plays written by African Americans, has a monthly poetry slam called "The Word."

"Midnight Madness" is another event held once a month on Thursdays that allows amateur playwrights to share their scripts and gain feedback from the audience members who perform the script as improvisation.

The Purple Masque also has theater courses. The "Lunchbag" is taught in the spring and is required for students wishing to direct a show, Meadows said. Students perform a show over the lunch hour and allow the public to eat in the theater while enjoying a free show.

The Purple Masque has a "thrust stage," Richards said, meaning the audience surrounds three sides of the stage, allowing observers to see the performance at different angles instead of seeing just the front perspective.

"Some plays have to be done on a small stage," Richards said. "It gives people a way to see intimate theater."

Anderson said the setup allows for more audience interaction and feels more comfortable than bigger theaters because of the close proximity. She said it also allows designers to hone their skills in a smaller environment before moving on to bigger productions.

Colton Rice, sophomore in theater and actor in "Down the Road," said he enjoys the Purple Masque's size, despite the smaller audience space and minimal marketing.

"You can react from the audience as well as the actors," Rice said. "When you see an audience member walking away laughing or crying, that's when you know you've Anderson, Rice, and Richards all agree that the Purple Masque offers students a valuable gift: a real chance to practice what they love.

ASK THE FIFTH-YEAR

Quit job right away

My boss is riding me at work. What can I do?

Honestly? Quit.

That's what I do every time. I've had so many awful bosses in my life it's ridiculous.

Walking out in the middle of a shift is a great way to quit. Or perhaps, you will decide not to show up when they really need you. Then when they call, continually tell them that you're on your way and you'll be there in five minutes or that you just walked in the back door.

If it's just a college job to pay for groceries and beer, then I wouldn't put up with a bad boss. Especially when quitting is so enjoyable.

However, if you're in a career, then get with it. Obviously by now you should know what you're doing. Or you could always PhotoShop a picture of your boss with the local floozy and hold that over him until he treats you better.

ADAM
REICHENBERGER

My roommate always hoards the TV remote. What should I do?

Universal remote's are a glorious item. Go buy one and break his. They're also great for messing with your neighbors. At my old house it was a daily thing: I'd go sit in their yard and play with their channels. They never figured it out. But I guess they'll know now. No big deal - I never liked them anyway.

I noticed recently that my hair is thinning. I'm only 22. What options do I have?

Don't remind me.

Baldness has had its eye fixed on me for years, breathing down my neck. I know I'm going to wake up one day, and all my beautiful locks will be gone.

I don't get it - I've got more hair on my body than the average bear, but my head is shedding like an oak in autumn.

And I'm not talking about any of those sissy sun bears.

Like my friend Jay says, "Those are nothing but glorified raccoons." No, I'm talking about big ol' grizzlies and Kodiaks.

Seriously, what's the deal?

Is my body so concentrated on keeping the rest of it thoroughly insulated that it can't spend just a moment each day at least trying to keep the hair on my head?

And don't tell me it's not just my head; that's a lie. Last Halloween when I went as half-man and half-woman, I shaved the whole left side of my body.

I kid you not; before the sun rose on Nov. 1, I was in full uniform. It was insane. I'm glad I was asleep for it. I can't imagine what that would have felt like.

Why can't that happen to my head?

I don't know what to tell you, but good luck. I'd say go ahead and start shaving your head now so people get used to it. You can tell people you meet later on that you shave your head because women tell you they like the way it feels. That is what my editor at the Collegian does.

Now that I think about it, I really hope a guy sent this question in. If not, I apologize, and you have my deepest, deepest sympathies. Seriously - good luck, girl. I'm rootin' for ya.

2nd-annual race to promote family activity, healthy habits

By Amanda Keim
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

As a part of the efforts to improve Manhattan citizens' way of life, the second-annual Run Your Buns Off 13K race will be in Frank Anneberg Park on Sunday.

The race will begin with packet pickup at 8 a.m. and end with an awards ceremony at 11:15 a.m.

Carrie Snyder, race director, said she encourages individuals to get involved in the race not only to raise money but also to get moving. Snyder said she does not want people to become discouraged by the distance of the race.

"Our goal is to keep it very family-friendly and just promoting physical activity to the community," she said. "The biggest thing for people is to just get out and get moving with your family and not let the distance be a factor."

To create a family-oriented environment, Run Your Buns Off will feature three separate races: a 13K, a 5K and a Tot Trot. The 13K race is aimed toward trained individuals while the 5K race is labeled as a family fun run. Both of these races will feature cash prizes for participants ages 18 and older.

Snyder said the event is sponsored by three organizations and will collect for a food drive in conjunction with the Flint Hills Breadbasket.

"There's Kansas Wheat, which is an organization for the state of Kansas," she said. "It's a partnership between wheat farmers and the public promoting wheat consumption. The second is Kansas State University Health and Nutrition Society which is the department of nutrition graduate interest group. Third is the Manhattan Little Apple Roadrunners, which is a running club."

Kansas Wheat is participating in the race for the second year and encourages healthy eating habits, not only in participating athletes but also people throughout the community.

"We're hoping to increase our number of entries from last year but not only just those who are involved, but also if we could get some information out that carbohydrates are important for athletes," said Marsha Boswell, public relations specialist with Kansas Wheat. "That's important information for not only athletes but also the general public."

Sponsors of Kansas Wheat will provide trophies during the Kansas Wheat Awards Ceremony that will conclude the event. Volunteers of the organization also will hand out packets about grain foods, Boswell said.

In conjunction with Run Your Buns Off, a food drive on behalf of the Flint Hills Breadbasket will take place. Canned foods can be dropped off when picking up packets before the race and monetary donations will be accepted.

"With the holidays coming up, our goal is to get our warehouse back to provide enough food for all the families in need during the holiday season," said Rachel Rowe, Flint Hills Breadbasket Client Services Coordinator.

Though the race broke even in 2006, Snyder said this year, a percentage of funds will be donated to designated programs and extra money will be held over for next year.

"Once the money is collected and supplies are paid for, we will keep a certain percentage to go to overhead costs to get ahead and then we give the Health and Nutrition Society some money to help with their travel expenses when they do their one or two service projects," Snyder said. "Then we'll do a monetary donation to the Flint Hills Breadbasket."

Though the mail-in registration deadline has passed, walk-in registrations are still welcome today from noon until 8 p.m. and Saturday from 8 a.m. to 1 p.m. at Maximum Performance Fitness Center.

Last year the race had 65 participants. This year the current registration stands at 74, and Snyder said she expects it to reach anywhere from 100 to 120 people by the end of registration Saturday.

FRIDAY FACTOID

Union offers more food services

File Photo

Questions concerning historical information, news that was not covered or anything you want to know are welcomed. Please e-mail questions to collegian@ksu.edu.

Was there always a food court in the K-State Student Union?

The Union Food Court was remodeled in 1999. Before the remodeling, a cafeteria and snack bar – separated by a moveable wall – were located in the current food court.

The snack bar – called the Stateroom – and the cafeteria served K-State students and the community from 1956, when the Union was constructed, until the late 1990s.

The cafeteria served three meals a day, while the Stateroom was open all day for students to get a snack and gather between classes.

Jack Sills, the Union director from 1988-95, stated in the 50-year Union anniversary booklet that the Union cafeteria did not just serve students.

He said Manhattan had few full-service restaurants and few fast-food restaurants in the past. He said people from the community regularly ate at the Union, especially on Sundays. Sills said churches even ended services at different times to make sure people did not overcrowd the Union.

In 1997, three nationalbranded food companies, including a sub shop, Chinese eatery and a traditional food place much like the Market Carvery in the Union today, were placed in the Union. Three years later, the cafeteria, food shops and Stateroom were replaced by several corporate food chains, like Taco Bell and Chick-fil-A, and seating was expanded.

The food court was constructed after a student survey showed students wanted a more up-to-date atmosphere in the cafeteria.

An easel stood covered with a purple cloth Thursday afternoon outside Hale Library.

At 1:30 p.m., Dean of Libraries Lori Goetsch announced the library café's new name – The Bookend Café.

Jenny Glodowski, senior in family studies and human services, won an iPod Nano for her first-place name suggestion.

Second and third place, respectively, received $50 and $25 K-State Student Union gift certificates.

The initial contest received more than 300 entries, which were narrowed to five finalists – Hale Library Café, Common Grounds, Sunflower Café, The Bookend Café and The Bookdrop Café.

"Someone actually suggested Hale Library Café – we didn't just throw it in there," said Tara Coleman, science librarian and Hale contest coordinator.

From the five finalists, about 300 people ranked the names on a "love it, hate it" scale.

"Because it's a café for the students, we wanted the students to have their say," Coleman said.

After the announcement, Goetsch poured a cup of coffee near the easel, and students and faculty received free coffee from the café.

While the renaming contest is done officially, Goetsch said the library continues to receive name suggestions on its Web site.

The café, which opened Aug. 20, had a selection committee made up of three staff members from the Union and three staff members from Hale.

People could submit as many names as they wanted.

While anyone could submit name suggestions, only K-State students were eligible for prizes.

"We had some wonderful names, many of which we couldn't use because they were inappropriate or were possible violations of copyright," Goetsch said.

C-SPAN | Campaign 2008 bus visits campus, other cities in Kansas

C-SPAN also made a stop at Abilene High School at 7 a.m. today. Students watched "The Washington Journal" with host and C-SPAN CEO Brian Lamb and guest Juan Williams, National Public Radio's senior correspondent. A phone line was dedicated for the students to provide comments and ask questions.

With an election-themed exterior, the bus contains a $1.3 million production studio and mainly is used for community-education outreach programs, Neiderer said.

The C-SPAN Bus program started in November 1993 as an effort to demonstrate cable's commitment to education. The bus restarted as the Campaign 2008 bus in January, and it has since traveled to 52 U.S. cities in 27 states.

C-SPAN, which stands for the Cable-Satellite Public Affairs Network, first went on the air in 1979 with the broadcast of a speech by then-congressman Al Gore.

The network, which is based in Washington, D.C., provides unfiltered, unbiased coverage, Neiderer said. The network runs no commercials and is provided through Cox Communications.

The network also focuses its camera angle on speakers with a standard head shot, and there are no scrolling texts or video clips on the screen, Neiderer said.

"We do everything in our power to not interject and not provide you with commentary," he said. "We figure you are smart enough to have your own opinion."

K-State's Student Governing Association also sponsored C-SPAN's tour stop. SGA members had a voter-registration table Thursday afternoon. Daryn Soldan, Governmental Relations Committee chairman, said SGA had the table to build political awareness among students.

"We wanted to give people who aren't registered the opportunity to vote, especially with the upcoming presidential election," said Soldan, graduate student in landscape architecture.

Ashley Reinert, fifth-year student in secondary education, said her Social Studies Methods professor had students attend the C-SPAN presentation to learn about www.C-SPAN-classroom.org resources.

While she has watched C-SPAN in the past, Reinert said she was not aware of the network's online resources. She said she plans to integrate C-SPAN material into her teaching.

"Some of the stuff they showed us with past and present video clips would definitely be great to integrate into the classroom," she said.

Reinert said it is important for students to remember C-SPAN is nonpartisan and presents only facts without commentary.

Students also should pay attention to candidates and have a say in who becomes the next president, she said.

"There are so many choices and so many people running," Reinert said about the 2008 presidential campaign. "So many people are throwing their hat in the ring — it's not just a given."

During the past four years as a C-SPAN marketing representative, Neiderer said he has traveled to 48 states. Each town and city offers something different as he travels with the bus, he said.

"The excitement around the upcoming presidential election also is everywhere in the country," Neiderer said. "It's always been an exciting job for me because of those factors."

Neiderer said it is important for U.S. citizens to understand the political system prior to voting age.

"The whole essence of our democracy is participation from its citizens," he said. "People should be on top of the issues and know the issues that affect us on a daily basis."

GREEN | Class discusses methods

the group said they were excited about the development of new green products. They like that most of the products have become cheaper, which makes it easier for people who want to try and change their lifestyle to be more green.

McCulloh said people who are concerned about green products extra cost should consider the money that will be saved in the long run based on green products' greater efficiency.

"The real issue for students is that they can save money, because these products are so much more efficient," she said.

While the group encourages purchasing earth-friendly products that people will need, they expressed concern about the cause and effect behind the nation's buying and the huge gap that has emerged between the rich and the poor.

"We are in a consumerist society where we want everything cheap," McCulloh said, "but people in foreign countries that are making our products are paying for this. If adding 25 cents to the price of tennis shoes allows people to make more money to live, then why isn't that being done?"

McCulloh warned that people can get overwhelmed by everything that can be done to save the environment.

"I think you can get crazy about this, but on the other hand, I'm concerned about the planet," she said. "I don't want my grandkids to not be able to have all the abundance that I've had."

Wallace said she too is concerned about her children's future and the future status of the planet.

"We're going to have to start paying attention now," she said.

PROJECTS | Student group sells recycled crafts to raise funds

members use denim from jeans and glue it to the cardboard.

"It's a good conversation topic," Ortiz said. "Making all of these things is really unconventional, and usually someone starts a conversation about your notebook."

He said the group also makes pillows by hand-sewing fabric and stuffing it with old dryer sheets to add fluff and a little fragrance.

"The girls brought an old skirt, and we just saved up a bunch of old dryer sheets," he said.

Ortiz said saving items and reusing them is good, but it is helpful to label boxes for the items so homes do not get cluttered. He said consumers also should rinse out all items of food to avoid attracting bugs.

"It consumes less resources, and it takes up less space in your house," he said. "A creative project, which you get more out of than if you were to just go buy something, saves you money. If you do it with a group, it's a fun group project."

Wittman said the members often have their crafts sold at Rockstar and Rogers Clothing and Costume in Aggieville.

Rebecca Craig, co-owner of Rockstar and Rogers said the store has sold some of the notebooks, buttons and crocheted bags for SEA.

Craig said the store sold the items for the group to help with its fundraising. While she said the store buys items from customers, she said the items depend on their quality.

"If they're making something we think is cool, and it's for a good cause, we'll help them out," she said.

'MOST EFFICIENT THING'

Wittman said the organization also has trade parties to help reuse items the members do not want.

"You just pile it all, and people take whatever they want," she said.

She said items that often are traded are clothes, kitchen appliances, furniture, electronics, compact discs, movies and books.

"You're wasting resources by buying something new," Wittman said. "If you would actually reuse items you would find that your life is a lot less cluttered and you save money. It helps save on resources that were used to make those products."

Megan Bindel, senior in geography and biology and president of SEA, said common things college students waste are grocery bags and water bottles.

"Plastic is one of the most inefficient things to recycle," she said.

If students reused their own canvas bags for their groceries and heavy-duty water bottles instead of the disposable ones, less environmental resources will be used, Bindel said.

According to the Kansas Green Team Web site, other items that can be reused are cardboard boxes for shipping items and two-way envelopes. Reusing household items like coffee cups, utensils and dishes instead of using disposables also saves resources.

Used books and magazines also can be donated to local bookstores, literacy programs, hospitals or schools, according to the Web site.

SKI | Team competes in 3 events

Frankovic said. The other two events are slalom, which involves cutting in and out of buoys, and trick, in which a skier performs as many freestyle tricks as they can in 20 seconds. These two events require a lot of technical skill and it takes some time to get the hang of it, and Cless said time was not something that the young team had with such a short preparation period.

The team had only one tournament and relatively little practice time heading into last weekend's competition. That, combined with a lake that is oftentimes rough and lacks a practice ramp, made ample preparation a difficult task.

Whatever the reason might have been for not moving on to Regionals, the tournament gave the fledgling team something to aim for next year. Cless said the experience gave them an idea of the things they needed to work on for next year to help rebuild the team.

With the season over, the team plans to go on doing what it has enjoyed doing from the beginning. Love of the sport, fun, and friendship will bring the skiers out to Tuttle Creek Reservoir for as long as the weather holds out.

"Now we're back to skiing for fun for the next two or three weeks, or until it starts getting cold," Cless said.

OFF THE FIELD | DEFENSIVE TACKLE STEVEN CLINE

Sporting a pair of camouflage cargo shorts and a camo K-State hat, defensive tackle Steven Cline took some time to answer questions for this week's Off the Field segment. Quite appropriately, most of the conversation centered on an activity in which that camo hat might come in handy — hunting. Fishing and hunting have been a part of Cline's life since his high school days in Palm Beach Gardens, Fla. Though fishing at Milford Lake is a bit different than going deep-sea fishing in the Atlantic Ocean, it's still fun for Cline to go out and relax with his friends on his boat.

How long have you been into hunting and fishing?

I really don't remember when I first started. It had to be in high school. I've been fishing all my life, but I started hunting probably in high school.

How often do you get the chance to go now?

We try to go whenever we can. I like to bring other people. I brought (Ian Campbell) one time, and he had a good time. The last week of turkey season, I shot my first with a bow, so that was cool. Whenever I get a chance to go fishing, I go fishing. I just bought a boat for $200, and me and Clayton Cox and a couple other people have worked on it, and it's ready to go, and we've been out fishing on it.

You're from Florida, so do you do a lot of deep-sea fishing when you're back home?

Yeah, we do a lot of fishing down there. We have both salt water and fresh water.

Is that something your family likes to do?

No, I think I pretty much picked it up on my own. It was just me.

What's the biggest fish you've ever caught?

I don't know. I'd have to think about that. I'd say probably 80 pounds or 90 pounds.

What kind of fish was that?

I'm trying to think. I've caught marlin before, but it wasn't that. I don't know.

Where's your favorite place to fish here?

Milford Lake. I'm not going to knock Tuttle Creek just because it's in Manhattan, but I wouldn't go there.

What was it like growing up the youngest of five children?

I've got two brothers, a sister, and then me and another brother. My sister's in the middle. I guess I'm the baby. Growing up, I guess my mother just didn't really care anymore.

Is the stereotype true that you're the most spoiled because you're the youngest?

No way. (Laughing) I've worked for everything I've got.

How long did it take to adjust to Kansas from Florida?

I don't know. Coming up here was the first time I've ever seen snow and actually been in it. I kind of got used to it. I like the outdoors and stuff, so it wasn't a big change in that aspect. I've been here for six years, so it's been a long time, but it was fairly quick I got used to it.

So where do you want to live when you get done here?

I have no clue. Wherever whatever takes me.

So you don't know what you want to do when you graduate?

Nope ... I'm a social-science major with an emphasis in public relations and a leadership minor, and I'm actually going for my master's in student personnel. I want to do something in sports, something sports-related, like advertising or marketing or something like that.

KANSAS STATE

TEXAS

OFFENSE

James Johnson has 225 yards on better than seven yards a carry in the last two games. K-State had 69 rushing yards in the win over Texas last season, so Johnson could provide a more balanced attack. Texas ranks No. 21 in the nation in rush defense, giving up only 87.3 yards per game. That means Josh Freeman and big-play receiver Jordy Nelson might need to have success early, allowing the Wildcats to open up the run.

Colt McCoy has 1,054 passing yards and seven TDs, and he is averaging 36 attempts per game. He'll probably throw the ball often against a K-State defense that has allowed just one rushing score. Jamaal Charles, the Big 12 Conference's leading rusher with 471 yards, will have to get something going to keep the pressure off McCoy. If that doesn't happen in the first quarter, McCoy might end up firing away for the rest of the game.

DEFENSE

Don't expect K-State to give 42 points to Texas again. The Wildcats' defense has shown marked improvement and ranks No. 14 nationally in total defense with 258 yards per game. The Longhorns have yet to be tested by a stout defense, and they managed only 21 points in a narrow, season-opening victory against Arkansas State. The key for K-State will be its ability to pressure the quarterback, something it has done with regularity in the first three games.

K-State's 45 points against Texas last season were the most given up by a Longhorn team since Oklahoma scored 65 in 2003. That probably won't happen again. Texas is giving up 18 points per game, but its strength lies in the ability to create turnovers. The Longhorns have 10 so far, including interceptions by five different players. That's bad news for Freeman, who has shown a susceptibility to make some bad decisions on the road in his short career.

SPECIAL TEAMS

Led by Deon Murphy, K-State ranks third in the nation in punt returns. Tim Reyer leads in the Big 12 in punting and Brooks Rossman has not missed a field goal. Overall, K-State's special teams is still a strength. They will have to be against the Longhorns, just like last year when the Wildcats blocked a punt and nailed a 51-yard field goal to seal the victory. If it's a close game, Rossman and Reyer could make the difference.

Kicker Ryan Bailey has hit 10 of 12 field goals, and has shown his range with a long of 52 yards. If it turns into a field-goal battle, Bailey's big leg could be key. Texas has also shown an ability to come up with a big special teams play, like a blocked punt that led to a touchdown against TCU. The Longhorns blocked a punt last year against K-State, but it wasn't enough to come out on top.

PREDICTION

With an extra week to prepare for Texas and the Longhorns' failure to dominate unranked teams this season, this game seems ripe for an upset. K-State should be unfazed going into Texas, especially with the experience of playing at Auburn four weeks ago. If K-State's special teams can play a mistake-free game, the Wildcats just might pull off the upset for the second year in a row.

Messing with Texas

The Wildcats sack former Texas quarterback Jevan Snead during last season's 45-42 win over the Longhorns. The victory gave K-State a 3-2 record against Texas since Big 12 Conference play began in 1996.

K-State, Texas might have makings of new rivalry

By Ryne Witt
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Owning in the sports world doesn't really mean to buy something and have control over it.

It means to beat someone, whether it is an individual or a team, again and again and again.

Some people could look at the competition between K-State and Texas last year and think that term applies.

In football K-State beat the No. 4 Longhorns 45-42 in Manhattan. It was a Josh Freeman to Yamon Figurs touchdown party and Ron Prince's signature win in 2006.

Then basketball came along and former Longhorn Kevin Durant waited for the Wildcats in Austin, Texas. But, K-State won that one too, 73-72.

Because of the success in both major sports, many Wildcat fans have taken the notion that K-State might own Texas. But linebacker Ian Campbell doesn't quite agree with that assessment.

"I think those ownerships are up for year leases, because you got to play everybody every year," Campbell said. "So I don't think you can just say that you own anybody. But if K-State fans want to say that, then they can go ahead and say it."

There isn't a long history between the two schools on the gridiron. It's been a relatively dramatic one though. K-State has met Texas nine times, with five of those coming since the Big 12 Conference was formed in 1996.

In those days, K-State was the powerhouse and Texas was the team trying to return to its days of former glory. That didn't serve well for the Longhorns, as they were dominated by K-State 48-7 in 1998 and 35-17 the next year. After those games, the next three got a lot closer.

"If you look at the history of the last three games, we lost 42-45, we won 24-20 and won 17-14," Longhorn coach Mack Brown said. "The last three games that we have had with Kansas State have been really tough games and really good games, and we will know more about ourselves this weekend because they are a really good football team."

Brown can't say that about many Big 12 teams, considering the Longhorns are 70-22 overall against conference foes and have a winning record against all but two schools.

Those two schools? Oklahoma and K-State. And of those two, K-State has the best winning percentage, with a 3-2 record, compared to the Sooners' 6-5 mark.

With teams like Nebraska and Missouri in the Big 12 North, most would not think K-State would be the only challenge to the Longhorns, but that's not the case. The Wildcats are the only North team to beat Texas in the regular season since 1997 and ended its 21-game conference win streak with the victory last year.

The Wildcats also own other important dates against the Longhorns. K-State is the last team to beat Texas in a Big 12 opener (1998) and a Big 12 home opener (1999).

Consider this: In the history of the Big 12, Texas has outscored its opponents by 1,322 points, or an average score of 36-21.

When it comes to K-State, though, it's a different story. The average score is 32-21 in favor of the Wildcats.

No one really knows why K-State plays Texas so well. It might be that the Wildcats have 13 players from the Lone Star State on the roster, or maybe it is the start of a new rivalry.

"Every week it feels like a rivalry to me because it's never easy to win," Campbell said. "Some fans might take one game more seriously than others because maybe he's from Texas or his wife's from Texas or his brother-in-law went to school at KU or is a Nebraska fan, so I think it's all personal thoughts."

Texas coach deals with players in legal trouble

By Joel Jellison
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

If FOX decides to film another season of "COPS," then get ready, because TV viewers could get a special college football edition from Austin, Texas.

OK, well maybe it isn't quite that bad for Texas. However, it isn't necessarily looking good for one of the nation's top-tier programs, which has had to deal with six player arrests this season. The situation, Texas coach Mack Brown said, has been difficult on him and the program.

"I've dealt with more in six months than I've dealt with really in almost 23 years and especially more than 10 (years) here," Brown said.

The crime that has gotten to Brown the most occurred in the summer, when three players — Robert Joseph, Andre Jones and James Henry — allegedly were involved in a robbery.

Brown called that incident, if true, "disturbing" and "a lingering distraction."

Texas did not learn of Henry's involvement until recently, when he was arrested on Sept. 17.

"I wish that we had known sooner so we could have dealt with it at that time, but obviously we didn't," Brown said.

The other three arrests involved charges like driving while intoxicated and drug possession.

Brown said he thinks Henry Melton and Sergio Kindle have learned their lesson, after both were suspended the first three games of the season because of DWI charges.

"We seem to have taken a negative and turned it into a positive," Brown said.

Former national championship teams getting in trouble with the law seems to be a trend. Texas has had eight players arrested since winning the title in 2005, and Florida — the defending national champs — already has had seven players arrested this season.

Brown's troubled players obviously have taken a toll on him. However, it has done nothing but reinforce his belief that it is important to have a team with good character.

"When someone is accused of trouble or has trouble, it's devastating to me personally," he said. "It's something that I feel responsible for because I brought them here."

When it comes to pointing fingers in the problem and finding a solution, Brown points to himself to make changes.

"I just need to go back and look at me and not point fingers, not make excuses, but put it solely on my shoulders,"

Mack Brown is in his 10th season as coach at Texas. Since June, six Texas players have been charged with various misdemeanors and felonies.

TEXAS MEDIA RELATIONS

Brown said. "I am responsible for everything that we do, and I want to make sure that the University of Texas is getting what they're paying for. And right now, I've got to do a better job."

Though Brown said it is his responsibility to keep tabs on his players, NCAA rules keep coaches away from players in the summer — when three of the arrests occurred.

"We can't even be around them in the summer," he said. "They have to be accountable to the university. They have to be accountable to their families. They have to be accountable to this football team, and if you're not, then you won't play."

The legal issues around the program have raised questions about Brown — the coach who has built the Longhorns into a national powerhouse, a national champion and a factory for NFL prospects. Some have said this could run the risk of ruining his reputation.

Brown, however, isn't worried about it. He believes his long-term record stands on its own merit.

"I have had 33 years of a good (reputation) and if six months ruins it, then it wasn't very good anyway in those people's eyes," he said.

K-State has chance to make another splash Saturday at Texas

People remember the chill of the night air, the screaming and the cheering.

It was a game that put "Incredible" on the Collegian's front page and sent fans rushing to Aggieville. K-State was the talk of the nation for a week.

That was after the 45-42 Wildcat victory over Texas.

I thought K-State had no chance to beat the Longhorns, but after the game I kept hearing words like "amazing" and "unbelievable."

It didn't seem right to believe the Longhorns lost to the Ron Prince-led Wildcats. Most people didn't understand what it meant for the program at the time.

That win was monumental because it made in-roads in a state that is the life-blood for the Longhorns. It helped put K-State back on the major recruiting map.

RYNE WITT

On signing day last February, six Texas high school students signed with K-State. That's seven if you include junior Deon Murphy, who played his high school ball in Houston but came from a junior college in Kansas.

The Texas win probably played a role in garnering those signatures. Murphy has said it was the kicker for him. And while K-State has a chance to punctuate its effort with a big road win Saturday, is it really possible for the Wildcats to beat Texas twice in a row?

Well, they've done it before. In 1998 the Wildcats won 48-7 and in 1999 they won 35-17. Back then, K-State was the power, and Texas was rebuilding.

Their places have now switched. Texas has won both the Big 12 Conference title and the BCS National Championship since 2005.

Still, the Wildcats own a 3-2 advantage over Texas since Big 12 play began in 1996. The only other team above .500 against the Longhorns is Oklahoma (6-5).

With K-State on the brink of being relevant again, Saturday's game might be the most important for the Wildcat program in years — maybe even more important than the game against rival Kansas next week. The prestige of Mack Brown and his NFL-ready roster make it that way.

If K-State does win, it will put the Powercat behind those "talking heads" that Prince always brings up. It will make K-State a national force again, and that helps recruiting.

More doors will open and higher-profile players will want to play in Manhattan.

Does it mean every recruit will want to come to the Little Apple? Not exactly.

Prince wants to make a big splash, and he nearly did in the season opener against Auburn, but he broke form at the very end.

This is his second dive this season, and it is up to him and his team to make the future of K-State football bright again.

KEYS TO VICTORY

1. DESTROY MCCOY

Former K-State linebacker Brandon Archer taught Texas quarterback Colt McCoy a valuable lesson last year: don't try to run against the Wildcats' defense. Unfortunately for K-State, Archer won't be around to remind McCoy why he left last season's game early with an injury. This year, McCoy has thrown for 1,054 yards and seven touchdowns. Impressive statistics, but McCoy also has five interceptions. If K-State's secondary has been watching enough film, safety Marcus Watts and Co. should be able to force turnovers.

2. GIVE FREEMAN FREEDOM

In last year's win against Texas, quarterback Josh Freeman passed for 269 yards and three touchdowns while K-State's rushing attack faltered, with just 23 yards. Though it will be difficult, K-State still can win without having a sound running game. Of course, coach Ron Prince will have to give Freeman the opportunity to throw the ball downfield. Last year's Texas secondary, which consisted mostly of upperclassmen, was shaky and struggled against the pass. This year's group of defensive backs seem just as vulnerable.

3. CONTAIN CHARLES

Texas running back Jamaal Charles leads the Big 12 in rushing. Luckily for the Wildcats, stopping the run is their strength. K-State is No. 9 in the nation in rush defense, holding opponents to only 68 rushing yards per game. If K-State is looking for an easy way to swing momentum, why not try to strip the football from Charles' grasp? His next fumble will be his fourth; he's had trouble holding onto the football throughout his collegiate career.

4. TAP INTO PRINCE'S BAG OF TRICKS

The trick play has worked, is working and will work. K-State's victory over Texas last year featured two key passes from a player not named Josh Freeman. Senior Jordy Nelson already has two touchdowns passes this season — tied for the team lead — and a third at Texas will not hurt the Wildcats' chances. Perhaps Prince has a fake punt or field goal ready for Mack Brown's Longhorns. Certainly Texas has to expect the unexpected. The Wildcats need to catch them off guard with a deceptive play that will open things up for the offense.

5. DON'T SHOOT YOURSELF IN THE FOOT

Do you know who is averaging the most penalties and penalty yards per game in the NCAA? You guessed it — the Wildcats. K-State has racked up 41 penalties in three games for a grand total of 399 yards. That's an average of 133 penalty yards per game. Since it's not Christmas, the Wildcats don't need to be giving away presents to the opposition. Not if they want to win, anyway.

Saturday night, the banquet featured recipes from Davidson's novels. After dinner, Caldwell said Davidson spoke about how she ended up writing a series of novels about a caterer.

"She worked with a caterer to find out about the catering business," Caldwell said.

She said she met many wealthy people who would come into the kitchen and talk down to the caterers. Caldwell said Davidson used all those people and situations she dealt with while catering as characters and scenarios in her books.

"She brought the house down," Caldwell said.

Another highlight of the conclave was a law enforcement panel.

"Every year it's a little different," Caldwell said. "This year we had a scenario set up — a murder, murder mystery — and our experts told us how they would handle it."

Felisa Osburn, GMMC committee member and reserve specialist in circulation at Hale Library, said this year's law enforcement panel was especially interesting because Robert Beattie, author of "Nightmare in Wichita: The Hunt for the BTK Strangler," of Wichita, Kan. attended. Osburn said Beattie, who is from Wichita, was interested in the discussion and said the panel would be helpful to his next book.

She said Beattie was particularly interested in how the media can affect cases.

"One of the main things (Beattie) learned is what they, all of them, call the CSI effect, about how jurors expect CSI results in real life now," Osburn said. "They expect you to be able to get DNA results in an hour. They expect to have 3-D displays up, from when you're doing the prosecution or defense ... They don't want to convict unless there's DNA evidence, and they expect it all to be done quickly. All of them talked about how that is a problem

$17,950 in jewelry stolen

By Willow Williamson
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Thousands of dollars in jewelry was stolen from a Manhattan woman's residence this past weekend.

Someone entered Gail Masintio's home at 9000 Blue River Hills Road on Friday, and stole numerous pieces of her jewelry, according to the Riley County Police Department.

A pistol also was stolen, according to police.

Lt. Kurt Moldrup said the lost jewelry and the pistol were valued at $17,950.

Included in the stolen jewelry was a half-carat diamond ring, valued at $5,000, a pearl necklace and pearl earrings, Moldrup said.

The RCPD did not announce if there are any suspects nor did they release any other details.

AUSTIN, Texas — This was supposed to be a revenge game, a chance for Texas to get payback against K-State, the team whose fans rushed the field after last year's stunning upset victory at Snyder Family Stadium.

Having the Wildcats on its home turf at Royal Memorial Stadium, a venue that's rarely gentle with opponents, the Longhorns expected to have a significant advantage.

They entered having won 30 of 32 games at home since Mack Brown took over as coach in 1998. K-State, meanwhile, had lost 46-straight games against top-10 teams on the road.

Not anymore.

Behind a stingy defense and an opportunistic special teams, K-State punctuated last year's victory with a 41-21 triumph over Texas in front of 84,864 fans.

The Wildcats moved to 3-1 overall, while the Longhorns — or Wranghorns, as some folks in Texas are calling them — dropped their first Big 12 Conference opener in eight years.

"We're not used to losing around here,"

Conclave gives writers chance to connect with each other

Speaking about her latest novel, "Sweet Revenge," Diane Mott Davidson speaks to the Great Manhattan Mystery Conclave at a banquet Saturday night about where mystery writers find their inspiration. The conference had sessions, panels and workshops on Friday, Saturday and Sunday.

Dead bodies, ghosts and detectives were the main topics of discussion last weekend during the Great Manhattan Mystery Conclave.

The conclave, a mystery-writing conference, was held Sept. 28-30. Many writers and fans came to participate in panels and discussions. Some of the featured guests included Diane Mott Davidson, Chris Roerden and Will Thomas, author of "Some Danger Involved."

Marolyn Caldwell, chair of the GMMC committee, said this conclave was smaller than previous years because it was competing with another larger mystery convention called Bouchercon, which was held the same weekend in Anchorage, Alaska.

This year's guest of honor was Diane Mott Davidson, a New York Times and USA Today best-selling author of Goldy, the mystery series about a caterer, according to the GMMC program.

Saturday night, the banquet featured recipes from Davidson's novels. After dinner, Caldwell said Davidson spoke about how she ended up writing a series of novels about a caterer.

"She worked with a caterer to find out about the catering business," Caldwell said.

French pianist performs 3 encores, receives standing ovations

By Adrienne DeWeese
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Eyes focused intently on a French pianist younger than most audience members Friday night at McCain Auditorium.

Jean-Frédéric Neuburger, 20, performed a 90-minute program of Classical, Baroque and Impressionist period composers — entirely from memory — for about 450 audience members.

Neuburger finished his program with three encore pieces, which each received standing ovations from audience members. It is often a European tradition for concerts to end with three encores, said Gary Mortenson, Department of Music head and professor of trumpet.

"When he senses a part of appreciation from the audience, he wants to give more appreciation to the audience," Mortenson said.

The program featured composers like Johann Sebastian Bach, Frédéric Chopin, Franz Liszt and Maurice Ravel. Bach's "Jesu, Joy of Man's Desiring" ended Neuburger's program, though the song did not appear on the program's original schedule.

Mortenson said he thought it was interesting that Neuburger brought his program full circle. He said Neuburger opened with the technical Bach piece "English Suite No. 2 in A minor, BWV 807" and ended with an emotional Bach piece.

Todd Holmberg, McCain executive director, also said Neuburger's final encore was a charming and mature way to end the program.

"His artistic maturity told him he didn't have to end with a bombastic, show-stopping piece," Holmberg said. "I think the audience really recognized that and enjoyed that."

Neuburger also participated in a master class for piano performance majors and music students on Thursday in All Faiths Chapel. Christine Merklein, senior in music and pre-nursing, played a Chopin nocturne during the master class, and Neuburger offered her suggestions for improvement like alternate fingering patterns and dynamics changes.

Neuburger's musical abilities and control of the piano impressed Merklein, she said.

"I was pretty impressed considering he's younger than I am," she said. "He could play a lot of technically challenging pieces."

In 2000, Neuburger entered the Conservatoire National Supérieur de Musique et de Danse de Paris, also known as the Conservatoire de Paris. Neuburger also has studied with Russian, French and Japanese pianists.

Mortenson described Neuburger's piano playing as highly accomplished with an incredible talent for someone his age. Mortenson also said Neuburger's 90-minute piano performance completely from memory was intellectually daunting.

"He's a product of the conservatory system and a product of Europe, and that's obvious in his playing," Mortenson said. "He plays with great nuance and great technique, which is incredible for his age."

Neuburger was the 10th Young Concert Artists musician since 1999 to perform as part of the McCain Performance Series. Young Concert Artists, founded in 1961, is a professional organization that helps start the careers of young international musicians. Neuburger won the 2006 Young Concert Artists International Auditions in New York.

It is important that the Manhattan community and K-State continue to receive exposure from the top artists in the world, Mortenson said. Neuburger is an example of an artist who now is winning the top competitions across the world, he said.

ture is a great benefit," Mortenson said. "This world-class artist shows our students the sort of commitment and artistry it takes to get to that level — that's priceless."

The McCain Performance Series has a history of showcasing artists with bright futures like Neuburger, Holmberg said.

"We're proud at McCain because we can offer to our audiences people who are just starting their careers," he said. "We have a track record of showing people who have remarkable careers. Jean-Frédéric will be one of those success stories."

Mortenson said Neuburger showed his young age in only one area — stage presence. A comfortable presence when walking on and off stage, however, will come with time, Mortenson said.

"It was nice to see he doesn't quite have everything yet," Mortenson said. "He's got all the confidence and all the ability. He's just a little bit uncomfortable with the human side of things, but with the music side of things, he's all there."

SCOTT GIRARD

"They hate you," and "they want to kill us." These are not just cheesy lines from the movie "Team America: World Police" as a means of referring to terrorists. Presidential candidate Rudy Giuliani actually uses phrases like these while on the campaign trail.

Much like other past and present candidates, Giuliani plays on the fear of voters, convincing them they are in immediate danger and he is the most qualified to save them.

As mayor of New York City during the Sept. 11 attacks, Giuliani has no problem taking advantage of the way he handled the attacks from Ground Zero. One of the most intense drinking games is drinking every time Giuliani says "9/11" in a speech. Not even experienced college drinkers can handle that much repetition.

Giuliani incorporates "9/11" into every aspect of his campaign. According to a Sept. 25 Washington Post article, volunteers for the Giuliani campaign introduced a plan to raise $10,000 at a California fundraiser with donations of only $9.11.

Giuliani has received much criticism for this move. Democratic presidential candidate Chris Dodd called the fundraiser "shameless and sickening," while another candidate, Bill Richardson said, "We shouldn't use a tragedy for politics." Even firefighters, many of the people Giuliani stood by and supported directly after the attacks, have criticized him.

"It is nothing short of disrespectful to the legacy of the thousands of civilians and 343 brave firefighters who died at Ground Zero," the International Association of Fire Fighters President Harold Schaitberger said.

Giuliani said he did not endorse the decision, yet he has done nothing to publicly denounce the fundraiser.

He uses the attacks for his own gain, pulling on the strings of citizens' endless fear of terrorism. He tells them they are in danger. He tells them he knows how to crack down on terrorism. He tells them he has a record of strong force and language against terrorists. He is wrong.

According to a Sept. 24 Washington Post article, while he was a Department of Justice official, prosecutor and New York City's chief executive, Giuliani believed terrorism could be controlled through tough investigation and the legal system.

Now, Giuliani couldn't be further from that perspective.

Throughout his time as a top New York City official in the 1980s and 1990s Giuliani always kept a straight head and hardly ever jumped to conclusions about terrorist attacks. According to the Sept. 24 article, Giuliani said it was "irresponsible" to label the 1997 shooting on the top of the Empire State Building as a terrorist attack.

Giuliani even steered clear of jumping to fear-based, terrorism conclusions after the Sept. 11 attacks. When asked on the day of the attacks if the attacks should be labeled as an "act of war," he said, "I don't know that I want to use those words."

These days he uses those words often and inappropriately. Though Giuliani has a tough record on New York City crime like drug trafficking, he has not proven to be a national security professional — something fellow Republican presidential candidate John McCain has noted.

"It is unclear that (Sept. 11) translates, necessarily, into foreign policy or national security expertise," McCain said. "I know of nothing in his background that indicates that he has any experience in it."

Giuliani is stuck on Sept. 11 like a broken record. The attacks were more than six years ago. I'm pretty sure people don't need to be reminded of the lessons of the attacks.

They need to be told what needs to be done in the present and future — not what happened in the past, which is what Giuliani does when he champions his level-headedness during a tragedy with almost every voting issue.

Reliance on allies makes Clinton unsuitable for president

With President Bush's term ending on Jan. 20, 2009, it is of utmost importance that the United States elects a president who is prepared to go to war and not just concerned with waving a white flag in Iraq.

With the increasing tide of anti-American sentiment among foreign nations that could lead to war, Hillary Clinton, the leading candidate within the Democratic Party, would be a horrible choice because multilateralism will hinder any pre-emptive or imminent action needed to protect our country.

Threats from Iran have been piling up, and it appears the next president will be the one shouldering the problem that is developing.

Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad followed his speech at Columbia University on Sept. 24 with a defiant challenge to the U.N. General Assembly. In an Associated Press Sept. 26 article, it was reported that Ahmadinejad said, "I officially announce that, in our opinion, the nuclear issue of Iran is now closed and has now turned into an ordinary agency matter."

As if the prospect of a nuclear Iran isn't bad enough, Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez and Bolivian President Evo Morales are cementing ties with the rogue nation.

On Sept. 27, Ahmadinejad visited Venezuela and trumpeted the alliance by saying, "Together we are surely growing stronger, and in truth no one can defeat us ... We will continue resisting to the end in the face of imperialism, and the age of imperialism has ended."

While Iran is building a base of allies and promoting hatred toward western culture and affairs, Clinton makes conciliatory efforts toward Iran that have not slowed Ahmadinejad's quest to bring down the United States.

Clinton has implied she will not take action against an Iranian threat unless there is unanimous consent with other countries. On Oct. 31, 2005, Agence France-Presse reported Clinton said the United States needs to renew its reliance with other countries. She based this on the fact that we did not fight World War II alone; therefore, we shouldn't fight the war on terrorism alone.

Clinton's connection between World War II and the Global War on Terror is flawed. The United States did not venture into World War II because we had allies — we became part of the war after the Japanese attacked our nation at Pearl Harbor. The only similarity Clinton could have drawn between the two events is when provoked, the United States will attack.

More recently, during the Democratic Presidential Debate on Aug. 19 in Des Moines, Iowa, Clinton defended her vote on the Senate resolution to label Iran's Revolutionary Guard as a terrorist organization. She said the title gives "us the options to be able to impose sanctions on the primary leaders to try to begin to put some teeth into all this talk about dealing with Iran."

Despite her reasoning, Fox News reported on Sept. 30 that Iran's parliament voted to recognize the CIA as a terrorist organization as a saber rattling rebuttal to the Senate resolution. If Clinton believes simply calling an organization by what it is will help the United States combat the Iranian problem, what would her solution to a full-scale assault be?

Ahmadinejad said attempts to stop Iran's nuclear program are futile; therefore, Clinton's defensive policy amounts to useless rhetoric. If Clinton becomes president of the United States, the nation will be worse off. It doesn't matter if she can convince people her domestic policies will be better than the other candidates'.

Solutions to domestic problems won't help the United States if she can't protect the country from outside attacks. Her reliance on the United Nations and other countries will prevent her from being able to effectively respond to crises — just like her husband.

Breadbasket, Health and Nutrition Society benefit from race

Joslyn Brown | COLLEGIAN

At the Run Your Buns Off charity event, runners begin the 5K at 9:30 a.m. Sunday in Anneburg Park. About 120 people participated in the 5K, the 13K and the Tot Trot races. Proceeds from the race went to the Flint Hills Breadbasket.

By Willow Williamson
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Runners helped raise money for local organizations at the second-annual Run Your Buns Off race.

Carrie Snyder, race director, said the Little Apple Road-runners organized the 13K and 5K races. She said the Road-runners will send a portion of the profits from the race to the Flint Hills Breadbasket.

Profits also will go to the K-State Health and Nutrition Society, an organization dedicated to increasing knowledge in human nutrition at the individual, community and worldwide levels, according to the group's Web site.

Cereal Food Processors, Horizon Milling, ADM Milling and Kansas Wheat sponsored the race.

"Those sponsors really made it possible to have trophies, medals and cash prizes," said Marsha Boswell, Kansas Wheat representative.

Boswell said Kansas Wheat sponsored the race because the organization is trying to support athletics.

"One of the reasons that Kansas Wheat is involved in this event is because grain foods, which are high in carbohydrates, are essential for athletes for energy," Boswell said.

HNS provided all of the volunteers to help with the race, Snyder said.

Snyder said runners had to pay a registration fee, and they also were encouraged to give food or monetary donations.

About 120 runners competed in the race, Snyder said. She said she was happy with the number because her goal was reached. Winners received medals, trophies and cash prizes.

Mathew Chesang, K-State

alumnus, was the overall male winner of the 13K race, and Melissa Todd, fellow of counseling services, was the overall female winner.

"I don't know if I want to ever put a number on how long I've been running," Todd said. "I've been running half my life."

Todd said competing in races is important because it is a way to test oneself and increase motivation.

"I think that everybody can use goals," she said.

Trisha Culbertson, second-place overall female winner of the 13K race and graduate student in biological and agricultural engineering, said she enjoys races because they tend to always draw the same crowd, so everyone knows each other.

"It's cool to be in a running community," Culbertson said.

Culbertson said she used to run cross country for K-State, and now she and Todd train together. They travel together and run everything from 5K races to marathons. Because of the amount of time, money and effort the women said they put into their training, they said cash prizes are helpful.

Culbertson said her favorite races are marathons, while Todd said she enjoys the 5K and 10-mile races.

The entry fee for the race was from $15 to $25, depending on the race. Culbertson said since the money for the race is for a good cause, it makes the fee easier to pay.

"I like paying the entry fee a lot more when I know it's benefiting," she said.

Besides the overall winners who received cash prizes and trophies, there were eight age categories with first-, second- and third-place prizes in both the 13K and 5K races for men and women.

KU rivalry requires K-State students to make schedule for guarding campus

Many students can attest to the intense rivalry between K-State and the University of Kansas. However, compared to the rivalry rituals that used to take place on each team's respective campuses every year, the current name calling, booing, drink throwing and boasting is nothing.

The following is an article written by an unknown staff writer from the Oct. 15, 1929, Collegian, when the school was still Kansas State Agricultural College, depicting the events that happened before the big game.

RIVALRY REACHES HEATED STAGE AS K.S.A.C.—K.U. CLASSIC NEARS

Rivalry between the students of K.S.A.C. and K.U., whose football warriors battle Saturday afternoon at Lawrence, has reached a state of fever heat. Each year before the annual classic, attempts are made by students of the schools to paint their respective colors on the campus of their foe, but never has the rivalry reached such dimensions as it has this year.

The Jayhawks stole the march from the Aggies when the letters "KU" were daubed on the campus sidewalks in vivid blue and red paint. At the same time the ramps of the engineering building also received a coat of paint of the same hues.

SHORN OF THEIR LOCKS

Enraged by the onslaught of the aggressive Jayhawks, a band of K.S.A.C. students journeyed down the Kaw and painted purple and white on Mt. Oread sidewalks. On the same night, or early the next morning, a trio of K.U. students invaded Manhattan for a surprise attack.

However, the trio was caught by a large group of Wildcats guarding the K.S.A.C. campus — before any damage was done. The invaders were taken to the Kappa Sigma house and shorn of their locks. After the tonsorial celebrations were performed, the Kappa Sigma boys found that the members of the trio were their own fraternity brothers.

Groups from Manhattan later invaded the Lawrence university campus, armed with paint buckets and brushes.

At midnight, a fake program from Wamego stating that several earloads of students from Mt. Oread had passed through that city on the way to Manhattan, mustered initiates from almost every fraternity house in town, and hundreds of men were guarding the campus grounds, as well as the "K" southeast of town.

BONFIRES ILLUMINATE CAMPUS

Bonfires now illuminate the campus gates, the entrance to the stadium, and K Hill, as guards are constantly on duty at these places. The Campus Cats, a men's pep organization, has arranged a schedule for organizations to defend the campus for the rest of the week.

Male students move into West for 1st time since residence hall opened in 1962

By Jenna Scavuzzo
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Men have moved into a residence hall where only women have lived for more than 40 years.

Since its opening in 1962, West had been an all-women residence hall, said Derek Jackson, Housing and Dining Services assistant director.

The issue of allowing men to live in West Hall this year started because of an increase in male residence-hall contracts in comparison to female residence-hall contracts, Jackson said.

After receiving the fall 2007 residence-hall contracts, 50 men were still in need of a room.

"Even with the problem of 50 men needing a bed, there were still 50 beds empty and reserved for only women," Jackson said. "If this alteration in West Hall had not occurred, 50 men who applied to live in the residence halls would be without living space."

West appeared as a solution for the number of men who applied for residence-hall living, Jackson said. He also said West would not have been full without men because students typically do not preference West.

Housing and Dining Services mailed letters about the male residents to the women assigned to live in West prior to move-in day, Jackson said.

The letters explained the situation and offered any all-female moving arrangements to be made for those who requested an all-female living situation.

Some girls got in touch with Housing and Dining services immediately and were allowed to change residence halls, and some were content with the idea of men living in West, Jackson said.

"Most of the girls we contacted about the change were excited," Jackson said. "A few expressed concern, and they got priority to be moved. I now have no concerns from the residents living in West. Everything is working out great."

Fifty men and 250 women now reside in West. The rooms are divided into wings, with men living on the first floor in the A wing and on the second floor in the B wing.

Molly Coenen, sophomore in pre-psychology, said she does not notice the male residents often since they are on the first two floors in separate wings.

"Still, they give the dorm a friendly atmosphere and a fun vibe," Coenen said. "They introduced themselves, and we still have interaction with them. Almost all of the girls have no problem with boys living here."

Devin Bailey, junior in apparel and textiles, said she has lived in West since her freshman year. Bailey said she was surprised at the addition of male residents in West, but it has not affected her much.

"There are no major differences with the boys here now," Bailey said. "I'm just more cautious about going to the bathroom and what I'm wearing, because guys come to visit girls on the floor all the time. It's still a comfortable environment though."

Some men residing in West also enjoy the living situation.

"I believe that a residence hall needs a woman's touch," said Joel Hardy, junior in secondary education. "It creates a better, softer atmosphere. All the guys love living in West."

FOOTBALL | K-STATE 41, NO. 7 TEXAS 21

TURNING POINT

Jordy Nelson's punt return in the third quarter

The score was 27-21 K-State, and momentum was starting to sway toward Texas when Nelson received a Texas punt at the Wildcats' 11-yard line. He took it up the K-State sideline for the 89-yard touchdown.

QUOTE OF THE GAME

James Johnson | On how the Wildcats' speed matches up against the Longhorns:

"Texas has the fastest man in the Big 12, but I think overall we have better speed than Texas."

MAGIC NUMBER

4 | Texas quarterback Colt McCoy had four interceptions and was pressured all game. He had seven interceptions all of the 2006 season to go along with 29 touchdowns. This year he has a total of nine interceptions and eight touchdowns.

MVP

Jordy Nelson | Junior Deon Murphy called Jordy Nelson "the People's Champ" and Nelson crowned himself against Texas with 206 all-purpose yards and two touchdowns.

Staying ahead

Christopher Hanewinkel | COLLEGIAN

K-State's Jordy Nelson had more than 200 yards in total yards as well as two touchdowns, including an 89-yard punt return in the third quarter. This put the Wildcats up 34-21, sealing their second-consecutive victory over Texas.

Nelson for 2007 Heisman

As I drove back to Manhattan, I was thinking about what this column was going to be about.

I thought about the topic of the Big 12 North rising, but after a lot of thought and reading before I hit the road I realized that the topic was being covered by most sports journalists in the United States.

Then I hit the Kansas border and the topic popped in my head because it was a native of Kansas who has impressed me the most this season.

The topic was "Jordy Nelson for Heisman." Yes, I am starting the marketing campaign for the senior playmaker.

His stats are nice. He is averaging 10.5 catches a game and 124.2 yards a game. He is behind Texas Tech freshman Michael Crabtree in both categories in the Big 12 Conference, but K-State doesn't run a gimmick offense like the Red Raiders do.

Nelson does more than just receiving. He throws touchdowns, with a total of two this year, and he has an average 57 yards on three punt returns with one going for a touchdown. Overall, he is averaging 167.5 all-purpose yards per game.

While those stats aren't overwhelming, these are.

Over the past two games he has combined for 27 receptions and 325 yards receiving. If he continues at this rate he will finish the year with 1,491 yards on 126 receptions.

But stats are only part of the story.

When Nelson steps onto the field he is the best player. He dictates the game.

Junior Deon Murphy said Nelson opens things up a lot, and it is true. The defenses start to focus on him, and he still gets his yards, but he isn't cocky about it. When he is interviewed, he remains humble and smiles a lot.

His personality is different than most big-time wide outs. He is quiet and not flashy. He just plays, and his answers to questions are about the team — not how great he is.

He is mature and earned everything that he has done. He was a walk-on but is now a scholarship player dominating any team he faces.

Nelson even switched positions while he was here at K-State. He was a safety before he was a receiver. It was probably the greatest trade in K-State football history with senior Marcus Watts moving to safety, while Nelson made his way over to the offense.

Another one of Nelson's characteristics I consider an important part of the Heisman Trophy is how important he is to the team.

Nelson is sophomore quarterback Josh Freeman's favorite target. Nelson has 42 catches on the year. The next highest catch total is 17 for Murphy. The quarterback is probably more comfortable with him than any other wide receiver.

"As the quarterback, all you want is to just get the ball into Jordy's hands and let him make a play," Freeman said.

If K-State continues to put the ball in Nelson's hands, he will put up gaudy numbers, and the Wildcats will win a lot more games. That is why he should be at least a Heisman candidate.

Brown said. "Especially not like that."

Vegas sports books tabbed the game as a laugh, listing Texas as a two-touchdown favorite. It's fair to question if Texas took K-State as seriously as they should have.

"I think we surprised Texas today," said running back James Johnson, whose 85-yard kick return TD gave K-State a 21-14 lead late in the first half. "I think they were looking past us because they have Oklahoma coming up."

The Longhorns (4-1, 0-1 Big 12) trailed by 10 points at halftime but pulled within 24-21 with 8:07 left in the third quarter on Jamaal Charles' 6-yard TD run.

It didn't take K-State long to respond. Kicker Brooks Rossman's 44-yard field goal extended the lead to six, and after forcing a 3-and-out, the Wildcats let their special teams go to work again.

Senior Jordy Nelson fielded a punt at the 11-yard line, bounced outside and sprinted past Texas defenders with blockers out in front. By the time he reached the end zone, K-State's sideline already was celebrating.

"I'm about as stoic a person on the sideline on game day as possible, but the kicking game just excites me," said coach Ron Prince, who was seen dancing and stomping on the sideline earlier in the game. "I think that's where the game gets fun."

Not to be outdone by the special teams, K-State's defense turned in perhaps its most impressive performance of the year. They chased quarterback Colt McCoy from the game momentarily in the first half after hitting him a number of times behind the line of scrimmage.

And when he returned in the third quarter, K-State kept bringing the pressure. McCoy was forced into a pair of second-half interceptions and finished with four overall.

His first interception came in the second quarter, when junior Ian Campbell intercepted a pass in the middle of the field and sprinted 41 yards, untouched, into the end zone.

By game's end, K-State's defense and special teams accounted for 27 of the team's 41 points.

"We really wanted to try to build the team on special teams and defense," Prince said. "Today, I felt for the first time since I've been here that we played well in both those phases at the same time."

Nelson again led K-State offensively, catching 12 passes for 116 yards and a TD. He scored on the team's opening possession, a 4-yard pass from quarterback Josh Freeman.

"We're just running the plays the coaches are calling," Nelson said. "That's all we're doing out there. They're putting us in good situations, and I think they're anticipating what the defense is trying to do. They're calling the right plays and things are working."

Ian Campbell returns an intercepted pass for a touchdown in the first half.

K-State's Justin Roland recorded the Wildcats' second interception.

Justin McKinney celebrates K-State's third interception against Texas.

Courtney Hemdon pulled in the fourth interception against Texas' Colt McCoy.

BREAKDOWN

Special teams excel; Prince unable to contain excitement on sidelines

By Ryne Witt
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Ron Prince looked like a professional wrestler during the second quarter of the 41-21 K-State victory against Texas.

He was stomping, but he wasn't stomping mad. He was stomping for joy.

Where did that joy come from?

It wasn't the defense, even though it only gave up 330 yards to the Longhorns, and it wasn't the offense — despite scoring on their first drive, again.

He was doing the "Prince Stomp" for the special teams that sealed the game for the Wildcats with two return touchdowns and some impressive blocking throughout the day.

The stomp happened late in the second quarter as senior James Johnson took back a kickoff 85 yards for a touchdown. While Johnson was running it in for the score, Prince was high stepping it down the sideline — then came the stomp.

The return came at a perfect time as momentum was starting to swing to the Longhorns. They tied up the game on the previous drive to make the score 14-14.

That is what special teams has done for this K-State team. It has changed games.

"That is what coach Prince is all about, and that is what K-State is about," senior Jordy Nelson said. "(Special teams are) game changers — as you saw tonight — with our kick return and punt return."

The punt return that Nelson was referring to was his own.

With the Wildcats leading 27-21 in the third quarter, the K-State defense held the Longhorns to a three-and-out. Nelson was back to return along with junior Deon Murphy. The punt came to Nelson at the 11-yard line. He broke a Texas coverage man's tackle and then sprinted to the right where there was a wall of K-State blockers. He navigated the rest of the field and put his index finger up in the air as he ran into the endzone.

It was another special punch to Texas' gut.

It was the second-straight game that the Wildcats have

Head coach Ron Prince celebrates on the sideline as senior running back James Johnson carries an 85-yard kick return for a touchdown during the first half.

Students share about personal pet peeves, annoyances

By Amanda Keim
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The noise penetrates the room and hits your ears with a loud "smack." She's doing it again. Every morning she chews her gum like a farm cow that has not eaten for several days.

It is as though the noise is crawling just beneath your skin making you itch with irritation. Why does this noise – this constant "smack" – drive you so crazy? This pet peeve is far from an ordinary annoyance.

Everyone has them, and they come in all different forms of frustration and exasperation. Each pet peeve is personalized. Some people might be pushed over the edge by a constant clicking of a pen or a dramatic surge of hiccups.

MY SPACE

The "personal bubble" has existed for years as a space surrounding an individual at about arms' length. This bubble is used as a comfort zone for social interaction. In many cases, however, this personal space is violated.

When personal space is violated, Kristen Briggs, freshman in apparel and textile marketing, is one of the first to say, "Step back."

"My biggest pet peeve is when people are in my personal space," Briggs said. "It's like, 'This bubble is mine!'"

When people tend to stay in Briggs' bubble for an extended period of time, she said it makes her angry, sometimes enough to do something about it.

"If they stay in my bubble, I will flat out tell them to get out," she said. "I get mad. I don't show it but it stresses me out."

At times, even seeing others' personal space being invaded can cause a wave of frustration for Briggs.

"If I observe it, I'm like, 'Aren't they frustrated? Aren't they annoyed?'" Briggs said.

I DON'T SHARE

Personal items are just that – personal. Sydney Sutherland, freshman in business marketing and pre-law, hates to share her things with others.

"My pet peeve is sharing things. Just my personal items – every time I come to my room someone has used something," Sutherland said.

Though Sutherland is not an only child, she has diagnosed herself with the symptoms of one. Every time Sutherland thinks one of her objects has been used, she has a feeling of aggression, she said.

"I try not to react, but you get that gut feeling where you want to take them out," Sutherland said.

Issues with sharing and borrowing have been plaguing Sutherland since the beginning of the semester when she confronted her roommate about using her perfume.

"I confronted my roommate earlier this year, and from then on she didn't like me," she said.

SHUT IT

There are always people who cannot seem to hold their tongue. It is as if their mouth can't quit moving, and words spill over their lips in surplus. These types of situations are the ones that drive Adam Bandy, senior in accounting, insane.

"(My biggest pet peeve is) people who just don't shut up when they aren't talking about anything," Bandy said. "It wastes my time – my time is valuable."

When dealing with an overly talkative individual, Bandy explained there are several ways to handle the situation.

"Either I'm cool with it, and I'll just chat with them, or I'll tell them to shut up and leave," Bandy said. "Depending on what mood I'm in, I'd just sit them down and tell them no one likes a blabbermouth."

Bandy said when facing an overly chatty friend, he feels annoyed but does his best to manage the situation according to his emotions.

CUT IT OUT

Even the most trivial tasks can become a pet peeve. As toenail clippers skim nails and clip away the lengthened fragments, Sara Sorensen, freshman in apparel and textile marketing, is drenched in irritation.

For Sorensen, the "clip, clip, clip" of the nail being snapped away is dreadful.

"The clippers when they clip – ugh – I can't stand it," Sorensen said. "It makes my skin crawl. I don't want to be around them."

To avoid the excruciating torture of being subjected to nail clipping, Sorensen does not even cut her own nails. Despite this, her nails are no longer than the average individuals. Sorensen avoids the task by using a simple nail file.

Movie will not interest action- or political-film fans

"The Kingdom"

★★★★☆

Movie review by Brendan Praeger

Creating an action film set in the terrifying world of modern terrorism poses numerous problems.

"The Kingdom" struggles to please action-film lovers while injecting enough political drama to make every explosion relevant rather than mindless.

As a result, it feels like one of those ripped-from-the-headlines "Law and Order" episodes. It's entertaining enough to keep you watching, but it won't have a lasting impact.

Director Peter Berg has a couple good films under his belt, but "The Kingdom" marks his first entry into political drama. His last film – an adaptation of H.G. Bissinger's "Friday Night Lights" – actually stripped away most of the political and economic relevance found in the book.

The film opens with a quick lesson on 20th-century Saudi Arabian history. Basically, they found a bunch of oil. This has caused problems.

In an intense opening, a few terrorists disguised as Saudi police break into an U.S. compound to detonate a couple of highly effective bombs. After an FBI agent goes down, the response team heads in.

The team of investigators, led by Ronald Fleury (Jamie Foxx), doesn't get in without a fight. The U.S. government doesn't want them there, and it takes some tough negotiating with an ambassador to get clearance to land.

Once on the ground, they find that the Saudis are reluctant to let them investigate. What could have been a straightforward plot becomes complicated with political red tape. It is frustrating to watch, but that's probably the point.

As the film appears to be winding down, terrorists kidnap a member of the team. This provides a golden opportunity for enough bullets and explosions to please the action fans. Its intensity is impressive, but it's too little, too late.

All the actors perform well, but with a cast including Chris Cooper, Jennifer Garner and Jason Bateman, that is to be expected.

The handheld camerawork also shines in numerous scenes, but it's usually too disorienting and distracting to be effective.

Some critics have called "The Kingdom" a cross between "Rambo" and "Syriana," but that seems a little unfair. It never stoops to the mindless action of a "Rambo" flick, and it never comes off as pretentious as "Syriana."

The result is a film that isn't entertaining or relevant enough to warrant my recommendation. Action fans have better options, and political junkies should watch reruns of "The West Wing" instead.

Radiohead fans to name price for CD

Radiohead's new album, "In Rainbows," will be released soon through the band's Web site. Since the band does not have a label, it decided to release the album in a different way.

When shopping on the Web site for the album, no price is listed. Instead, the site states "it's up to you," because fans can choose what they want to pay.

The physical box-sets will not be released until Dec. 3 and will cost about $80.

Spears loses custody of sons to ex-husband Federline

A court ordered Britney Spears to give up custody of her two children "until further notice" Monday, according to an Oct. 2 article on CNN.com.

Kevin Federline, the father of the two children, will receive full custody of the children, Sean Preston and Jayden James, by noon on Wednesday.

The ruling is the most recent decision in the battle for the children that has been raging between Spears and Federline.

The reasons surrounding the order are unclear because the transcript of the proceedings were ordered to be sealed following the trial, according to the article.

Spears

This is the latest blow in the long freefall that Spears' comeback has included. She also danced and sang on the MTV VMAs last month, invited paparazzi into a bathroom with her and got caught using various controlled substances.

How long she can keep the act up is a mystery, but while it's going on, at least we have something to talk about.

MYSTERY | Editor/author Chris Roerden speaks at conclave

because that's not really how it is."

One panel held on Saturday was called, "Location, Location, Location - Using It Well." The panelists included writers Radine Trees Nehring, Nancy Pickard and Patricia Stoley.

Nehring, author of "A Valley to Die For," lives in Arkansas and said she sets all her novels in her home state.

"I wrote what I knew then, and I did not move very far from home," Nehring said. "The place where (her heroine) lives is where I live. The hills and hallows she walks in are where I walk. So I do know that landscape."

Nehring said she has been to the conference every year and said one of the reasons she enjoys it is because it gives her a chance to meet other writers.

"Writers kind of work alone, as you know, so, it's nice to come to a conference," Nehring said.

Pickard, author of the Jenny Cain and Marie Lightfoot mystery series, lives in Kansas and said at first she wrote about places away from Kansas, because she was not satisfied with her own home.

"I set my heroines, my stories where I might want to live so I could enjoy that vicariously."

However, she said eventually she came to love Kansas, and her current novels are set, if not in Kansas, in Midwestern locations.

"I'm a Midwestern girl, and it's all I will ever be," Pickard said. "I love to be a Midwestern girl, and I really love Kansas, and for the first time I was just overwhelmed with the desire to do nothing but write about Kansas."

One of Sunday's featured events was a seminar by Chris Roerden, an editor and author of the nonfiction book, "Don't Murder Your Mystery: 24 Fiction-Writing Techniques to Save Your Manuscript from Turning up D.O.A." Her seminar was titled "Preventing Quick Rejection."

Caldwell said Roerden discussed the importance of not looking like an amateur during the first couple pages, because often those are the only things an editor will look at.

Seminars offered by people like Roerden are important for any writer looking to get published, Caldwell said, and conferences like the Mystery Conclave are one of the only ways to get this type of experience.

"We are bringing that little bitty entryway - it's kind of like a secret door - into the market," Roerden said.

Writers should consider writing conferences to be business opportunities, Caldwell said.

"We're a professional group, and it's kind of a business meeting," she said.

The idea for the conclave came about four years ago when Caldwell was working at the Manhattan Public Library, she said. It began when the Library celebrated its 100th anniversary and some of the people on the library board, including Caldwell, decided they wanted to have a party. Caldwell had worked on mystery conventions before, so she knew the right people and that party turned into the first Great Manhattan Mystery Conclave.

CITY COMMISSION

Businesses seek parking changes

By Nicholas Birdsong
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

City commissioners will discuss new parking regulations for Aggieville today.

"There won't be any formal action at the meeting, but the Aggieville Business Association is going to ask for feedback and try to get a direction to go," said Manhattan City Clerk Gary Fees. "Voting will probably occur later - anywhere from two weeks to six weeks."

Jeff Levin will present the proposals on behalf of the Aggieville Business Association in front of the commission.

The group includes 44 businesses in the Aggieville Business District, according to the association's Web site.

The association requested the regulation changes to alleviate some of the parking congestion in the Aggieville area, according to city officials. Potential parking regulation changes include parking time restrictions, raising parking fines and restricting alley driving in some areas to one-way only, according to city officials.

In addition to the parking issue, city leaders will vote on two rezoning requests.

Commissioners will have the option of rezoning a portion near Fort Riley Boulevard on the south end of Manhattan to make a new commercial district, according to city officials.

At the meeting, GTM sportswear will request a rezoning for an area next to Poyntz Avenue for an expansion of the store.

Both projects received a 5-0 vote for approval from the Manhattan Area Planning Board on Sept. 6, city officials said. Overruling the vote would require four or more of the commissioners to vote against the projects.

returned a punt for a touchdown. The previous one was against Missouri State. Murphy had an 80-yard return in that game. Now K-State seemingly has two dangerous punt returners.

"Kicking the ball to me or Jordy is a two-way go," Murphy said.

Murphy believes touchdowns might be a regular occurrence for the two playmakers.

"It's always routine," Murphy said. "Next week we are going to look for another one."

Neither of the two returns could have happened without great blocking. It was something that both Johnson and Nelson complimented.

"People did a good job blocking for me," Johnson said. "It opened up right away for me."

Nelson echoed that.

"The blocking does a lot for you and it makes it a lot easier," he said.

Overall, the K-State special teams scored a total of 20 points on Saturday and proved that it can win games for them.

"I wouldn't be surprised if we work more than anyone else in the Big 12 on special teams," Nelson said. "We do it every day and it's all out."

K-State defensive back Courtney Herndon pulls down a Texas receiver during the second half. The Wildcat defense forced Texas to throw four interceptions.

Wildcats defeat Aggies despite poor hitting

By Jon Potter
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Despite a slow start and a rough environment, the K-State volleyball team defeated Texas A&M in College Station, Texas, on Friday, for the third time in school history.

Coach Suzie Fritz said she didn't feel like it was her team's best possible effort, but she saw several things she liked.

"The first 20 points of the match were pretty slow," Fritz said. "I felt like we played really well in a very difficult environment."

The No. 17 Wildcats (13-3, 5-1) took down the Aggies (12-4, 2-4) in four (23-30, 30-24, 30-27, 30-23) and recorded eight service aces and 66 kills.

"I felt like Rita Liliom played very well down the stretch," Fritz said. "Rita took some big swings when we needed them."

Liliom finished the match with 16 kills — one of three Wildcats to finish with more than 10 kills. Juniors Nataly Korobkova and Jenny Jantsch were the others who broke into double-digit kills, tallying 17 and 14, respectively.

The match was marked by uncharacteristically low hitting percentages on both sides, as the Wildcats hit .185 on 178 attacks, and the Aggies hit .132 on 159 attacks.

"We did a very nice job defending their left-side attack," Fritz said. "Probably 70 percent of their offense goes to two players, and we held them to a very low hitting percentage. Blocking was a huge factor during the match."

Sophomore middle blocker Kelsey Chipman led K-State in blocks with 11 and one solo block. Chipman was closely followed by senior setter Stacey Spiegelberg, who finished with eight blocks.

The Wildcats totaled 62 digs, with six players who tallied five or more digs. Senior libero Angie Lastra finished with a match-high 23 digs, marking her 24th career match with 20 or more digs.

"Angie always seems to be there and makes plays when we need them," Fritz said. "She is always very consistent."

The Wildcats' next match will be Wednesday in Lincoln, Neb., as they challenge No. 1 Nebraska. Play is scheduled to begin at 7 p.m.

WOMEN'S GOLF

Team tied for 2nd after 1st day of Sunflower Invitational

By Adam Ashmore
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State women's golf team finished the first day of the Sunflower Invitational at home tied for third place.

K-State coach Kristi Knight said she was happy with the way her team played and felt the women hit the ball better than they scored. "The girls played hard, hit the ball well and had good attitudes," Knight said.

Thanks to back-to-back rounds of 73 by senior Kali Quick, the Wildcats find themselves within sight of the tournament leader, Kansas.

"Kali did not finish as strong as we know she could, but she played some solid golf today," Knight said.

The Wildcats finished with a combined 36-hole score of 605 and find themselves in contention for a victory on Tuesday.

To have a chance Tuesday, coach Knight said the team needs to cut out the big numbers and not get ahead of themselves.

"The girls need to stay in the moment and not look ahead," Knight said.

With 18 holes to play, K-State trails Kansas by five strokes and Missouri by two strokes.

The nominal deficit puts K-State in a good position for advancement tomorrow, and they are in good position to place high in the 13-team event.

CROSS COUNTRY

Women take 12th place in Minnesota; men grab 20th

By Wendy Haun
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State women's cross-country team once again had strong showings from junior Liliani Mendez and sophomore Beverly Ramos, who led them to a 12th-place finish at the Roy Griak Invitational in St. Paul, Minn., on Saturday.

Mendez finished 25th, with Ramos 20 seconds behind her, which was good enough for 36th. The rest of the women's team finished above 100th place, but the members were less than two and a half minutes behind Mendez. As a team, K-State finished with 380 points, which secured them 12th place.

"For the most part, we were ready to run, but as a team, we had an average day," said coach Michael Smith. "We executed what we thought we could, but we didn't quite get the results that we thought we could get."

The home team, Minnesota, finished in first place. Other Big 12 Conference teams that finished ahead of K-State were Nebraska (fifth place), Iowa State (ninth) and Missouri (10th). They finished ahead of the University of Kansas (16th) and Oklahoma (17th).

Alex Umberger, junior, once again led the men's team, finishing in 71st place. Junior Danny Schneider finished in 100th place, and freshman Mike Sickafoose finished in 119th place. As a team, K-State finished 20th, with Northern Arizona taking the men's crown. Other Big 12 teams that finished were Oklahoma (ninth), Missouri (10th), KU (13th) and Nebraska (15th).

"I think we had some guys running what they were capable of running," Smith said.

"The younger guys learned they could push a little bit more. They saw some Big 12 competition there and ran well against it."

K-State will travel next on Oct. 13 to Terre Haute, Ind., for the pre-NCAA Championship meet before going to Lubbock, Texas, for the Big 12 Conference meet Oct. 26.

Overall, Smith said he saw what he expected, but he has seen glimpses of excellence in both squads.

"I think we're going to see a breakthrough," he said. "They raced against some of the best teams in the country. They didn't fold under that pressure, but they didn't exceed expectations."

"If you just run average with that kind of competition, the flaws get magnified."

Academic Majors Fair in Union today

By Adrienne DeWeese
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Students who have no clue about their future academic careers might come one step closer during the ninth-annual Academic Majors Fair today in the K-State Student Union Ballroom.

The fair primarily is for freshmen and sophomores who need to make an informed decision about declaring a major, said Angelia Perry, College of Arts and Sciences academic adviser. Curriculum guides will be available at the fair, and academic advisers can answer students' questions about academic majors and career opportunities they offer.

"It's to help students navigate through all of the options and see what's available so when they choose a major they choose one confidently that fits their abilities," Perry said.

More than 1,000 students are expected to attend the fair, which will feature about 80 representatives from all nine academic colleges at K-State, from 11 a.m. to 3 p.m., Perry said.

About 1,500 K-State students are open option, or undeclared, majors, Perry said. The fair takes place in October because students should begin pre-enrollment for spring semester courses that they think will fit their majors, she said.

"It's set up so students can see all of the possibilities or just move to one area and see the opportunities within a particular college," Perry said. "Information that is difficult for students to run all over campus to track down will be available in one location."

While students can explore different academic career paths, they cannot declare specific majors or minors at the fair, Perry said. Students must declare majors or minors through the dean's office within a particular college, she said.

Students also can learn about minors and secondary

Students, state employees learn to fight wildfires

More than 100,000 wildfires burn 4 million acres annually on average in the United States, according to the National Wildlife Coordinating Group Web site, www.nwccg.gov.

Kansas might not witness the intensity of burning wildfires that can last for weeks on the West Coast, but its residents have the opportunity to fight the fires firsthand.

The Kansas Forest Service, located within the College of Agriculture, has employees that can instruct students willing to travel to the other side of the country to face the heat.

1ST-HAND EXPERIENCE

The Kansas Forest Service is located under the Department of Horticulture, Forestry and Recreation Resources at K-State.

Jason Hartman, fire prevention specialist, is the instructor of the Wildland Fire Management Class that is offered through the Division of Education under the Department of Horticulture, Forestry and Recreation Resources.

Eleven students thrashed through vegetation during their Wildland Fire Management class last week.

The class met at the Blue River Hills, land that is the property of the university, so the students could learn about the use of hand tools and the duties of a hand crew.

"This will be more interesting than a Power-Point," Hartman told the class.

Hartman said the class was designed to prepare students to safely and effectively perform a fire assignment.

"Specifically at K-State, it gives them added training in their careers as park managers," he said.

Hartman said the students earn a National Wildlife Coordinating Group certification after completing the class. He said if students want to gain the experience with fighting wildfires, they are able to do so with the Kansas Forest Service.

Eric Ward, fire planning specialist with the forest service, said the agency hires people to help with the hand crew for the summer, which is the busiest time of year for the forest service, though the fires burn from May to October on the West Coast.

Kite's Bar and Grill expands to include 42-inch plasma, 15 flat-screen TVs

Steven Doll | COLLEGIAN

The additions to Kite's Bar and Grill include a 42-inch plasma TV encased below the entrance floor and 15 new flat-screen televisions. Kite's opened more than 50 years ago.

By Mayra Rivarola
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Kite's Bar and Grill is taking over the corner block of North 12th and Moro streets.

As of last Saturday, customers can meet their friends and have the chance to show off their moves on a new and expanded dance floor, said Chris Smith, manager of the location.

The addition includes a 42-inch plasma TV encased below the entrance floor and 15 new flat-screen televisions, Smith said.

He said he hopes the new section will attract more customers.

A valuable mirror set from the original Kite's hangs behind the new copper and marble bar.

"It maintains the tradition," Smith said. "Same style - same menu."

The bar perpetuates a 50-year-old tradition.

In 1954, Keith "Kite" Thomas opened Kite's Bar and Grille, marking the beginning of a 50-year tradition, according to the Kite's Web site, www.kiteslive.com.

In 1994, Kite's was purchased by Rusty Wilson, owner of Rusty's Last Chance, and the business was liquidated, according to the Web site. Kite's later reopened and continued the bar's old slogan, "Meet your friends at Kite's."

Alexander Beim, senior in management, said his uncle told him about Kite's before he came to college.

"When he found out that I was going to K-State, his first recommendation was not that I should study hard, but that I should visit Kite's and then tell him about it," Beim said.

He said his uncle wanted to know if it continues the same tradition after its closure in 1994.

Beim said almost everything appears to be the same as what his uncle described - only now there is more space.

Besides the dance floor, Smith said there will be 12 more tables and another DJ booth. There also will be a couple dart boards and other games.

"I am planning on going there pretty soon to check out the changes," said Larissa Chase, junior in economics.

Chase said she goes to Kite's often since she celebrated her 21st birthday this year.

"It is always exciting to see places grow," she said.

This growth is only the beginning of Kite's expansion, Smith said. He said he hopes to expand the menu to include breakfast items and desserts, to attract a wider range of customers.

Smith said the ultimate goal for the owners of Kite's is to open a new bar in the east side of town, emulating a New York City piano bar.

K-State researchers scour Internet for data to aid Homeland Security

By Scott Girard
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Students' Facebook and MySpace profiles are looked at by more than just their fellow online friends.

K-State researchers, under the auspices of the Department of Homeland Security, peruse these social Web sites on a regular basis.

"If it's on the Internet and publicly available, it's mine, and I can get it at eight people per second," said Tim Weninger, graduate student in computer science.

The research is part of a large three-university project funded through a $2.4 million DHS grant. William Hsu, associate professor in computer science, leads the research at K-State.

The research does not just mine through social Web sites. Hsu said he searches the Internet for any publicly accessible information, including photographs and documents, for any links to terrorism. Hsu also said he and his research team of graduate and doctoral students also look at sensitive data provided by the DHS.

"Our models are widely applicable," Hsu said. "We have lots of different applications of a very general response technology."

Hsu said the DHS is interested in three main areas of research - mining, collecting data, for social links on the Internet, how to predict future acts of terrorism through data mining, and ways to simulate these attacks.

Hsu said originally the Navy and now the DHS are interested in finding trends and other information that can help them simulate real-life combat and rescue situations.

"What we set out to do - instead of scripting unrealistic situations - we wanted to script real scenarios that could actually happen at any time," Hsu said.

He said the University of Illinois, the main researching university in the project, first received contracts from the Navy to compile data to improve vessel and crew safety. He said the government continued to grant Illinois money for data mining, which is what he did as a student at Illinois.

After he graduated from Illinois, Hsu said he brought that research to K-State and helped set up a partnership with Illinois, the University of Texas at San Antonio and other universities.

Hsu said he spends about 40 hours a week on research and preparation for future grants.

"This is a full-time research project," Hsu said. "And this is our most time-involved project."

Hsu said he and his research team develop programs to mine the Internet for any relevant data, including the relatively new form of research on social networks.

Hsu said the massive amount of people on these sites can make it hard to evaluate data, which is why it is important to account for numerous factors like similarities of friends, mutual friends and types of friends.

"It becomes really important to classify what kind of friendship it is and how long it will last," Hsu said.

Weninger said there is hardly ever a time when his Facebook applications define some students, annoy others

By Whitney Hodgkin
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

John Caton could be identified as an ice vampire, a fire werewolf or a zombie ninja.

Caton, senior in psychology and anthropology, is one of many students who uses Facebook.com applications, which allow him to be anything online, from a vampire to a ninja. He said the applications he uses help identify him.

"Your applications can define you," Caton said. "I think they're useful because I have difficulty talking about myself sometimes. So I let my quirkiness come out in my applications."

Malorie Lucich, a spokeswoman for Facebook, said in an e-mail interview more than 80 percent of users have used at least one application on the Facebook Platform, which was introduced in May.

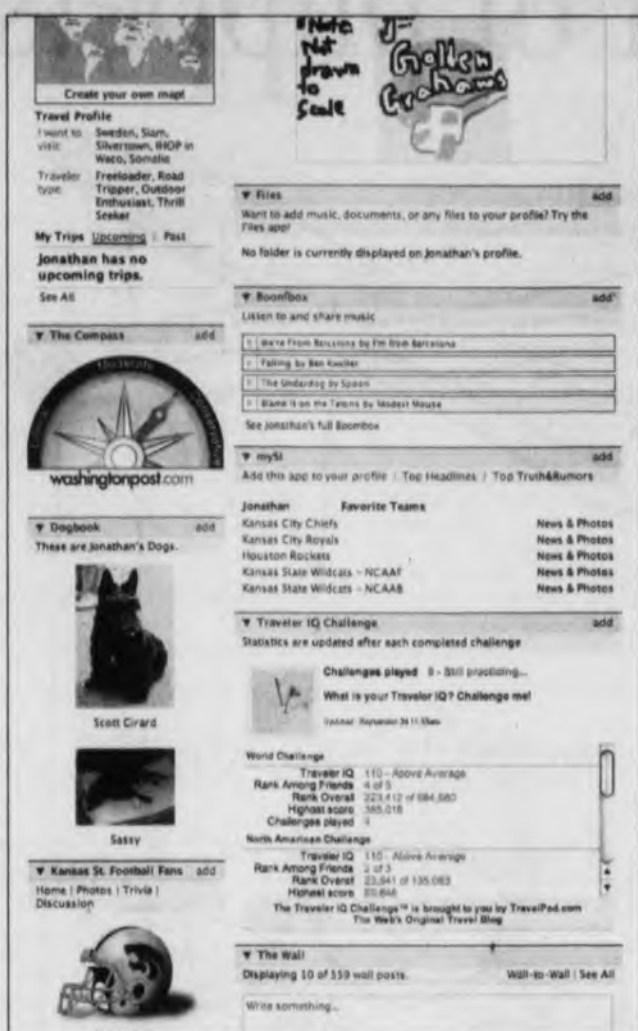

When Facebook started adding the applications at the rate of Internet refreshment, Mark Zuckerberg, creator and CEO of Facebook, addressed the addition in a July 17 Time article.

"What we're trying to do is make it really efficient for people to communicate, get information and share information," he said. "We always try to emphasize the utility component."

"Our whole theory is that people have real connections in the world. What we figured is that if we could model what those connections were, we could provide that information to a set of applications through which people want to share information, photos, videos or events."

Students like Caton have indulged in the applications, like Facebook for iPhone, zombie invites, honesty boxes and naughty requests. However, others are not as excited about the addition.

"I think the applications are annoying for the most part, though some are kind of fun," said Jessica Whittamore, senior in criminology and pre-law. "People feel the need to add every application they're invited to, which is annoying because it takes a long time for the pages to load because they're so cluttered."

Whittamore said she liked the original Facebook design better because it was simple and basic, and she doesn't want to see user options expand further.

Other students worry the Web site is trying to mimic social networks like MySpace.com.

"I don't add all the applications I get invited to because I don't want my profile looking like MySpace," said Mike Bogina, senior in civil engineering. "I liked it better when it was only open to students so I didn't have to worry about people outside the college spectrum looking at my profile."

Security and accessibility issues are addressed on Facebook's privacy page, which has settings for users to control who can search for them on the site and how much of their profiles users can see.

"There's a snapshot of your whole life on your profile," Bogina said. "I'm sure there are lots of people out there just drooling to know all of our preferences and friends."

Zuckerberg, who famously turned down a $1 billion offer from Yahoo to buy the site, has no intentions of taming his creation.

"Whole companies are forming whose only product is a Facebook Platform application," he said. "It's really exciting to our users because it means that a whole new variety of services are going to be made available. All these things will just get more and more evolved."

Alpacas introduced at vet hospital

By Monica Castro
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State's Veterinary Medical Teaching Hospital has acquired alpacas for students to work with after more than 20 years of work to implement a camelid program.

Rose Ann Knoblock, with her husband, Steve, worked since 1984 to get a program with alpacas implemented on campus. Knoblock said they wanted to bring alpacas on campus to enable students to learn more and as a way of giving back to the community.

"This program was how we wanted to give back to K-State and the alpaca community," she said.

Knoblock said bringing this program to campus is positive for the alpaca community because it creates more awareness of the species.

She said she thinks the program will benefit K-State because it will boost the Veterinary Medicine Teaching Hospital.

Alpacas are one of four South American camelid species, said Dr. David Anderson, professor and Veterinary Medical Teaching Hospital section head of agricultural practice. The other species include the llama, vicuna and guanaco, which are distant relatives of the camel.

All camels are thought to have originated in the western United States, and then the camel migrated to Asia and Africa and the South American Camelids migrated to South and Central America, Anderson said.

Though the alpacas are open for all K-State veterinary medicine students to work with, seniors will have more opportunities to work in the alpaca program.

"The purpose of the program is to have alpacas in the vet school in order to give students experience," Anderson said. "This program will give them an opportunity to see and work with the animals in order to evaluate their behavior."

Anderson said it is important to work with alpacas because they are a common species, and he also wants students to have experience with the alpacas.

Matt Castro
COLLEGIAN

"The goal of the program is to increase awareness and comfort level for students to work with different species in the field," Anderson said.

Anderson said the program is an expansion of K-State's land-grant mission to support all aspects of animal agriculture in the state. He also said the program aids K-State in providing outreach, service, research and education.

"Having the program here will help attract prospective veterinary students because of the uniqueness of the program," Anderson said.

Anderson said K-State's Alpacas on Campus program is a joint effort between the College of Veterinary Medicine and the Mid America Alpaca Foundation.

Mid America Alpaca Foundation provides care for the alpacas at K-State. The foundation's $50,000 grant will provide five years of support for the herd of alpacas on campus.

Foundation president Bob Sines said he was motivated to start the foundation in 2004 because he owned alpacas and saw a need for more veterinary help if the alpacas became ill.

Since the foundation started, it has been growing because of the increase in farms and the alpaca population, Sines said.

"What we do is work with all the farms and breeders of alpacas in the Midwest and Western regions and draw awareness to the alpaca population and the need for veterinary skills," Sines said.

Through the Mid America Alpaca Foundation Web site, www.midamalpaca.com, people who own alpacas can find a list of veterinarians who can treat them.

The program's goal is to teach and provide students with practical experience so they can provide health care to alpacas. Sines said he wanted to give the alpacas specialized veterinarians, and this program will help to teach students how to give that care.

"We encourage seminars for veterinarian students and also for them to get out to farms, and by putting alpacas on campus we initiated that goal," Sines said.

Alpacas on Campus already has made history for K-State when the program successfully completed the world's first hip transplant on an alpaca. This was groundbreaking news for the Veterinary Medical Teaching Hospital because previously there was not even a camelid program.

"Without the knowledge a lot of these animals would not survive," Sines said.

Facebook changes unappealing

Facebook is changing, and it's turning off many college students, including us.

Facebook.com began as a chance for college students to network with other college students, but has been perverted into a flea market of useless Internet time-wasters.

When Facebook opened its doors to allow high school students, it lost much of its appeal.

Gone was the exclusivity to connect with users on a college level, and much of the decisions about the future of the site now were focused on the younger crowd.

The applications feature, which allows users to participate in quizzes and competitions and send gifts, drinks, or zombie diseases to other users, turned Facebook into a copy of its rival, MySpace.com.

These applications, intended for high-school students with too much time on their hands, make Facebook seem cheap and cliché.

Also, many of the applications seem inappropriate for the crowd it targets. We don't want cyber "drinks" sent to us by a 13-year-old.

Facebook also is used by graduate schools, professional organizations and potential employers as a "weed-out" tool for students with similar qualifications.

Inappropriate content on a student's profile could lead to a disadvantage when the time comes for an employer to make a decision.

We encourage students to present themselves through professional, responsible Facebook profiles.

TO THE POINT is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

Democrats use child to front CHIP campaign

Nothing tugs at the heart-strings of U.S. citizens like sick children. Democrats are using this gutless ploy in regards to the new Children's Health Insurance Program legislation they are trying to pass. U.S. Senator John Kerry, D-Mass., said, "... the president has now unilaterally declared war on ... health care (for) millions of low-income kids."

CHUCK ARMSTRONG

Apparently, President Bush's promise of a veto toward the new CHIP is equivalent to a declaration of war on little kids. And, since he is promising a veto, obviously he and all conservatives despise children.

To get their word out, the Democrats searched high and low throughout the country to find the smartest, most experienced individual who supports their cause.

Meet 12-year-old Graeme Frost, who this past Saturday, delivered the weekly Democratic Radio Address.

Frost is supported by CHIP and received the medical care he needed after a car accident left him with severe brain damage. The Democrats decided to exploit his trauma in hopes of pushing their agenda.

In his address, Frost said, "I don't know why President Bush wants to stop kids who really need help from getting CHIP." What the Democrats, who wrote this for Frost to read, forgot to tell the 12-year-old boy is the president does not want to end CHIP. He is opposed to the new CHIP Democrats recently introduced to Congress.

Frost went on to say, "I just hope the president will listen to my story and help other kids to be as lucky as me."

Frost must have been a little confused, because throughout his address, he acted as though the president is against health care for children. It is the Democrats who are in fact against a reasonable health-care system for children.

CHIP expired days ago. Democrats were pushing a bill they knew would get a veto from the president, yet they went ahead and kept it the way it was.

Children are already covered under the State Children's Health Insurance Program, but the Democrats wanted to prove a political point rather than actually create legislation that had a chance to pass.

Had the Democrats formed a bill that gained support from the president, like an extension of the former SCHIP, then some children would not be without health care. Actually, President Bush proposed a $5 billion increase of funding to SCHIP over the next five years.

But Democrats did not do that. Instead, they have attempted to prove to ignorant citizens across the nation that conservatives hate children. They have manipulated a 12-year-old boy's horrific injuries for their own cause.

It will be hard for conservatives to argue with a 12-year-old.

The Democrats have continued a campaign of exploitation that did not start and likely will not end with Frost's radio address.

Maybe Kerry can fight in this "war on ... health care (for) millions of low-income kids" and get himself a couple more Purple Hearts.

Bad attitudes affect airport experiences

Airports are generally the only place where most people will follow orders — usually in fear of the big bad airport security. If passengers relax and enjoy their traveling experience rather than fear it, everyone can have a smoother trip. If not, passengers' experiences can become dangerous — even fatal — situations.

CHRISTINE CAPLINGER

Last week, according to a Sept. 29 article on CNN.com, Carol Ann Gotbaum died while being detained in Phoenix. Gotbaum was on her way to rehabilitation when she got upset after not being allowed on her flight.

Gotbaum was left in a room by herself and was trying to break free of her handcuffs when she got them tangled around her neck. She went into medical distress, lost consciousness and could not be revived, according to the article.

Gotbaum could have acted differently to avoid the situation her actions created for her.

The Transportation Security Administration urges "all travelers to arrive at the airport well in advance of scheduled flight departures."

It also suggests using the "3-1-1" rule, allowing three-ounce bottles for liquids, one quart-sized bag holding the liquid bottles and one bag per person.

All these tips and rules will diffuse most frustration and wait time.

Being friendly and flexible during travel can be tougher than we admit these days.

Having heavyweight bags to lug through the terminal while being tempted by the combination of Pizza Hut/Kentucky Fried Chicken as we stand in long lines for extended periods of time is frustrating at best.

However, acting slightly upset, irritated or scared will cause a security officer or a flight attendant to put people in their place.

After getting into the terminal and checking bags, people are forced to take their shoes off, go through numerous metal detectors and might be subjected to "the Wand."

If a customer is not compliant or even if security just feels like it, this process can take up to 30 minutes.

Traveling can be stressful enough — everyone is cramped in a tiny seat that only tilts back 15 degrees, babies scream in your ear and the two-ounce liquor bottles are $5 each.

If Gotbaum had followed the rules the TSA suggests passengers follow, she still might be alive.

Airport security will frustrate many and embarrass them by letting the world know how badly they need to buy new socks and make sure the metal plate they put in their head is still there. Grow a thick skin, and put on a smile. With a good attitude, being detained and handcuffed will be the least of your worries. So for everyone who is taking a vacation, business trip or going to rehab, relax. If passengers relax, then traveling truly can be fun.

FIRE | Forest Service sends firefighters to sites like Katrina, Greensburg

he took the class to prepare for a future summer job with fighting fires.

Madison said he had some experience with fire management he could apply to the class.

"I live on a farm, so I've done pasture burning," he said.

Hartman and three other employees of the fire-management division of the Kansas Forest Service instructed the students on the use of the tools during the class.

"All these do essentially the same thing - they are for getting fuel off of the surface," Hartman said.

The class arrived at the site in the early evening to have enough time in the daylight. The students were told they were going "to dig some line," so they followed a tree line in single file to start the work.

Clad in jeans, T-shirts and work gloves, the students worked their way through the timber to the start of the first pink flag. The class followed pink flags up a steep hill and dug up the vegetation along the way.

Ward said the students were digging to simulate what a hand crew would do in the case of a smaller fire.

Ward said about 20 people are typically on a hand crew, and they create a stopping point for the fire by digging a line around the entire fire.

Hartman said the class started the first week of the semester, and it is offered one evening of the week. The field activity with the use of hand tools was the first the class has done for the semester.

FEDERAL DEPLOYMENTS

The Kansas Forest Service

started its Cooperative Fire Protection Program in 1962 to help with the suppression of wildland fires, according to the Kansas Forest Service Web site.

However, the agency's involvement with national wildfires did not become active until five years ago.

"The fire program - it's really grown within the last five years," he said. "It's more involved nationally with the training and the western fire fighting. Before, deployments were not coming from state employees."

Ross Hauck, fire-management coordinator with the forest service, said the federal deployment of the state employees is annual and has been stable for three years.

"We go nationally," he said. "We go any place that they request us. We tend to go more to the West than we do any place else, but now we do all-risk, which is the U.S. Forest Service's stance on everything."

Hauck said the national all-risk stance appeared after the Sept. 11 attacks. He said the U.S. Forest Service is monitored by the Department of Agriculture, and the employees help with everything from Hurricane Katrina to the Greensburg, Kan., recovery.

"It's very similar to the military system," Hauck said. "You keep making rank. Myself - I got into the business way too late to fight fires - so I'm a base-camp manager."

To increase ranks in the forest service, employees have task books they must complete. Hauck said he received his training while helping with the first responders in the Greensburg recovery.

Though Hauck joined the forest service late, he was a volunteer firefighter in Riley County for more than 30 years.

Hauck has been on a few deployments this year. His most recent one was in the Cascade Complex wildland fire in Idaho where he was a base-camp manager. His duties included managing the camp crews and setting up the base camps.

Hauck said the federal agency contacts managers who are closest to the fires, and if they are available, they are expected to leave within hours.

"Now we're looked at as a legitimate forest service," Hauck said.

Ward has been deployed to several western states. He said the hand crew does most of the hard work on the ground, and its members are mostly less than 30 years old because it requires a lot of physical work.

"For the most part, it's a young person's job," Ward said.

Ward said the federal deployment saves money for the state because the government reimburses the state for the deployed employees. While deployed, the employees are taken off of the state payroll for that period of time they are deployed.

The federal government reimburses the state for the use of its engines, and the money the state saves helps fund the agency's programs.

"It's a money saver on personnel and a money maker on the trucks," he said.

Ward said about 10 of the 25 full-time staff members have been deployed to help with fire management.

Besides being available for federal deployment, the forestry agency offers programs for rural forestry assistance, state-wide wildlife training and equipment, conservation tree seedlings and urban and community forestry programs, according to the agency's Web site.

computer is not collecting data through one of the many social Web sites like LiveJournal.com.

Weninger said through the research, the K-State team hopes to predict how, when and if certain online relationships will form.

Weninger also said the research could show ways to predict when and if certain people would become friends. He said information like similar academic majors, place of employment and many others can show more frequent instances of friendship.

Another important factor in social network data mining is determining implicit friends, or people who might not be online friends, but are connected somehow through family or other friends.

"(Terrorists) don't say 'Hey, we're a terrorist organization,'" Weninger said. "So we have to find them implicitly."

After research is conducted, the group's findings are evaluated and sent to the DHS, which uses this information to grant additional funds to universities all across the United States, Hsu said.

The current grant pays the K-State research group to do research mostly during summer break. This summer, Hsu and six K-State students completed an eight-week intensive research program to inform students about the data-mining procedures and mine for data themselves at the Data Sciences Summer Institute, located at the University of Illinois at Urbana-Champaign.

The research is a year-long process, though. K-State is competing with several universities and cannot afford to take breaks, Hsu said.

Hsu said he is drafting a grant to DHS for additional funds to extend and improve the research at K-State past 2009.

"To get a competitive edge in analyzing and making use of the data, Homeland Security needs the best and most cutting-edge technology," Hsu said.

Commissioners discuss changes for Aggieville parking at meeting

By Nicholas Birdsong
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Commissioners were briefed on proposed changes to the parking regulations for the business district south of K-State's campus at the Manhattan City Commission meeting Tuesday evening.

The need for additional parking has been increasing over time in combination with the construction on the K-State Student Union parking lot, said Jeff Levin, representative from the Aggieville Business Association, the group who proposed the changes.

"We need to increase parking turns to help us as a retail and service area," Levin said. "We are asking for the city commission's help on this issue."

The association suggested several ways to manage parking in the area, including restricting parking in the area to two hours, raising parking fines from $5 to $15 and creating parking permits for nearby apartment tenants.

Commissioners expressed approval of most of the suggestions offered by the association during the meeting.

"I believe all of the requests are highly reasonable and sensible," said Commissioner Jim Sherow. "And as we do improvements to City Park, it may not become as available or useful for parking which would further complicate parking in the area."

The proposed increase in parking fines brought the heaviest criticism from the city leaders. Increasing the fines is likely to create opposition, City Attorney William Frost said.

No voting took place on the issue at the commission meeting. The commission likely will vote on the issue in two to six weeks, City Clerk Gary Fees said before Tuesday's meeting.

Commissioners also unanimously voted to accept a joint Dial Realty request for rezoning the northwest corner of Fort Riley Boulevard and South Juliette Avenue and surrounding areas.

An ordinance also was passed that will allow rezoning in the area near GTM Sportswear for expansion of the store.

majors offered at K-State. An academic minor is an additional 15-20 credit hours while secondary majors are about 24 additional credit hours, Perry said.

"Every student has to declare a major," she said. "Some students decide to add a focused course of study to supplement their knowledge of their interests."

The Academic Majors Fair started as an opportunity for students to learn about academic opportunities while talking with academic advisers from different colleges, said Michelle Haupt, Academic and Career Information Center coordinator.

"What we typically hear from most students who attend is they walk away with information about a major they didn't even know existed," Haupt said. "The campus departments want to hear from students and know they are available for students. They are here to help students succeed, and I think that's evident through this event."

Prince's team takes in-state rival Kansas seriously after win at Texas

By Wendy Haun
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State will look to add another conference win Saturday against Kansas, but coach Ron Prince cautioned that it won't be easy.

In fact, Prince said the Jayhawks will give the Wildcats their toughest test of the season.

"This team has a player in the top three in 9 different categories, conference-wide," Prince said. "It's an awful lot of excellence. This game will be our greatest test we've had so far this year. We'll have to play very aggressively to have this outcome be the way we want it to."

KU is ranked first in the conference in scoring defense, passing defense and total defense. The Jayhawks also rank second in the league in total offense, averaging 552 yards per game.

Individually, Marcus Herford leads the league in kickoff returns, Joe Mortenson ranks No. 1 in tackles for loss, and Aqib Talib is tied for second in interceptions.

Prince is particularly concerned by quarterback Todd Reesing, who ranks third both in pass efficiency and total offense.

"He's a playmaker," Prince said. "He knows what to do with the ball. He knows the situation. He knows where his outlets are if he gets in trouble, and he's got enough weapons around him that not only can he play at his best if he needs to, but he can allow other people to move the ball, and he can make the critical play when necessary."

BACKUPS PROVE THEY'RE READY Several defensive players have stepped up their games, Prince said, and have proven to him why they should be playing.

"Every kid knows if he comes to practice, and he plays hard and fast, he can get our attention," he said. "He's not just banished to some far-flung place to be on the meat squad. Every kid who comes to practice - we're watching everything that goes on. When a young man demonstrates that he's ready, we're ready."

One player who saw playing time against Texas was senior defensive end Clayton Cox, who is second on the depth chart behind senior defensive end Rob Jackson.

"We'd like to play a lot of players in the game on offense and defense, every game," Prince said. "That's what the very, very good teams can do, and their performances don't drop off. John Houlik, Chris Carney and Moses Manu, some of these guys, they aren't all-Big 12-mentioned every week.

"When they can play at a high standard, that raises everybody's game, then there's some things in the kicking game and some coverages and things that we can do when they play very, very well."

ACCOLADES FOR K-STATE

Following the victory against Texas, the praise for the Wildcats came raining down.

K-State received its first Top 25 ranking since Sept. 5, 2004. The Wildcats received zero points in last week's poll but jumped to 214 votes for a No. 24 ranking, just four points shy of No. 23 Purdue.

Individually, junior linebacker Ian Campbell was named the Big 12 Defensive Player of the Week. Campbell had a key interception, which he ran back for a 41-yard touchdown in the second quarter to give K-State a 14-7 lead.

Senior wide receiver Jordy Nelson was named the Offensive Player of the Week. Nelson had 12 catches for 116 receiving yards and netted 206 all-purpose yards, which included an 89-yard punt return for a touchdown in the third quarter. He also had a four-yard touchdown reception.

The K-State team was recognized as the Tostitos Fiesta Bowl Team of the Week. One school every week is selected from four teams. K-State was nominated along with Auburn, Colorado and South Florida.

CU GAME TO BE TELEVIEWED

The K-State-Colorado game Oct. 13 will be televised on ESPN2. Kick-off will be at 8:15 p.m. at Snyder Family Stadium.

Wildcats take on No. 1 team

By Joel Jellison
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Despite the fact that K-State is playing the No. 1-ranked team in the nation, head coach Suzie Fritz played it off as just another game.

The Wildcats (13-3) won't overlook No. 1 Nebraska (12-0) today when they travel to Lincoln for a 7 p.m. tip-off, but they won't need any special preparation for them either.

"We prepare for everybody exactly the same no matter who we play, be it home or away," Fritz said. "We don't change what we're doing just because it's Nebraska or Kansas or Iowa State."

Fritz ranked this Husker team at the top of the Nebraska squads she has seen.

"They are physical, they have four legitimate All-Americans on the floor, and I think it's probably the best Nebraska team I have seen," Fritz said.

While Nebraska could be the toughest test of the season for the Wildcats, K-State still will play its style.

For the Wildcats to be successful against the Huskers, they will have to slow down the offensive attack of Nebraska.

"They are a very, very physical team, so we're going to have to play wonderful defense to try to slow them down," Fritz said. "We're going to find out whether we are a good defensive team I think."

Fritz said she hopes her team will continue its intensity as it faces Nebraska.

"I hope they get up for every match, that is what we're striving for is to not gang up on one and save it all up for one opponent," Fritz said. "I hope that they get excited about playing volleyball every time out."

While she held strong to her belief of treating every opponent equally in preparation, Fritz did mention her players understand the importance of Nebraska volleyball.

"I suspect that they understand the tradition of or the history of Nebraska volleyball," said Fritz. "It doesn't matter who is on the other side of the net for us."

Use cardio, strength training to tone glute muscles

We talk about it, we sing about it, and we - women at least - stress about it: the butt - or if you want to be more politically correct about it, the glutes.

Your derriere consists of more than just one big chunk of muscle. It actually consists of three muscles: the gluteus maximus, medius and minimus. Yes, you probably stash some fat in this area too, but I'm going to give you some ideas to make you booty-licious.

Just like when you train your abs, your arms or any other problem area, you need to know you cannot "spot-treat" with strength training. In order to achieve the look of being toned in any body part, not just your glutes, you need to minimize the fat in that area.

The way to do this is to embrace cardiovascular work. Hop on that Stairmaster and start sweating, because your bottom is begging.

So you've slaved away on a cardio machine and you're wandering around the weight room looking for a butt-blaster. Here are some machines to look for.

The Smith Machine: While it looks like a fancy squat-rack, this machine is so much more. Not only can you get a great workout for your buttocks, but you can do an entire body workout using just this machine. It's great for your lower body because it allows you to keep good form through some of the most beneficial, yet technically challenging, exercises.

The most popular exercise people do incorrectly is the squat. Some people don't do this exercise at all, for various reasons. The Smith machine makes squats easier for people with knee problems, back problems, form issues and just plain weak muscles. The Smith machine allows you to keep your weight centered and keep your knees behind your toes. It also helps keep your upper body neutral.

The Smith machine is also great for lunges. It allows you to lunge with more resistance than just your body weight. Challenging your muscles is going to keep your exercise routine fresh, and will keep you from hitting a plateau.

The Smith machine also allows you to work with a wider stance, which keeps your upper body from bending at the waist.

If you aren't sure how to do lunges or squats, ask someone at your gym. Though the Smith machine can help prevent injuries, you still can hurt yourself by using bad form.

The second machine to look for is the glute machine. I will be the first to admit that this machine looks like a torture device at first glance. Luckily, it's not so bad when you use it.

Those who have taken a group fitness class that targets the lower body might be familiar with "glute kickbacks." This exercise is done by getting on all fours on the floor and moving one leg like you are trying to "stomp the ceiling" with your foot. The glute machine is very similar to this, only with added resistance.

There are many other exercises that target the derriere. You can do bridges, where you lift your buns off the floor and squeeze. There are glute extensions with resistance bands or cable machines, where you extend your leg straight out behind you while keeping your body from tilting forward.

In addition, most exercises that work your hamstrings also work your bon-bon to some degree. Examples include dead lifts and prone hamstring curls. The more defined your hamstrings are, the more defined your money-maker is going to look.

These two machines are golden as far as rump-busters go. Remember - for good butt toning you need to incorporate cardio as well as strength training. There are numerous exercises that work any combination of muscles that make up the glutes. So, in the style of Sir Mix-A-Lot, shake that healthy butt.

Inclement weather cancels 2nd day of invitational at Colbert Hills

By Mike DeVader
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Senior Kali Quick of the women's golf team woke up Tuesday only three shots out of the lead in the Marilyn Smith/Sunflower Invitational at Colbert Hills Golf Course.

Quick was prepared to compete for the victory, but Mother Nature had other ideas.

The final round of the Sunflower Invitational was canceled shortly after it began early Tuesday, denying the Wildcats any chance of making a charge for the title.

The loss at a chance to make a comeback was frustrating for Quick and the Wildcats.

"It's really annoying that the final day got canceled because it was my final home tournament," Quick said. "I didn't even get a chance to challenge for the win."

With the weather out of the team's control, coach Kristi Knight stressed the importance of the players' safety.

"We were looking forward to the battle of being in contention for the win," Knight said. "The weather is just the nature of the game, and you can't take any chances with lightning."

The final results for the tournament were the scores from the first day, and the Wildcats placed third behind Missouri and Kansas.

Kansas won with a team total of 24-over par 600, and Missouri finished in second with a 25-over par score of 602. Missouri's Julia Potter took home an individual championship after shooting a 1-under par 143.

Quick played consistently on Monday, shooting a pair of 1-over par 73s. Her rounds of 73 were just one stroke short of her top 18-hole score this fall, a 72 at the Chip-N-Club Invitational.

"I'm finally playing the way I should be," Quick said. "Everything is coming together, but I just need to be more consistent and stay away from the double bogeys."

Quick's performance wasn't surprising to Knight.

"She played very solid golf even though she didn't finish as well as she would've liked," Knight said. "She is always steady at the top of the line-up."

Sophomore Abbi Sunner finished in a tie for 17th with an 8-over par 152. Sunner fired a pair of 76s and earned her second top-20 finish this season - the fifth of her career.

Knight said she believes her players are very close to where they want to be.

"I was really pleased with how the players were able to hang in there even though we struggled at times," Knight said. "We are really close to playing really good golf. I think they will use this as motivation when we head to Boise State."

With all eight players on the roster now having tournament experience, the Wildcats look to tweak the little things to finish rounds successfully as they head into the Bronco Fall

Christopher Hanewinkel | COLLEGIAN

K-State's Kali Quick tees off on the back nine Monday afternoon. Quick finished the Marilyn Smith Sunflower Invitational in third after storms affecting the Manhattan area ended play.

Invitational, Oct. 8-9 in Boise, Idaho.

"The golf shots are being hit good," Knight said. "We just need to be able to miss in the right places and stay away from big numbers. We need to save pars and start making birdies."

Students choose what to wear based on musical preferences

For some people, music affects every part of their life, including wardrobe. When two people meet for the first time, the first thing they might notice is how the other one is dressed, and they might connect the outfit with a specific genre of music.

EMILY
STERK

There are many types of music and some carry different styles of clothing with them. Five popular types of music are Goth, emo, country, hippie and pop.

Below is a list of the clothing types associated with each of the previously listed types of clothing.

While it is easy to stereotype people by what they wear and connect it back to a specific genre of music, it depends completely on the person.

GOth

Someone who is into heavy metal might be branded with the word "Goth." This type of person might listen to bands like Coal Chamber and Nine Inch Nails.

To be the typical Goth, clothing is simple: wear all black. It does not matter whether the black attire is baggy or tight as long as it is black. Hair should be spiked or in a Mohawk and, again, be all black. A hint of color is sometimes allowed, but can never take focus away from the black. Anything with chains, skulls or crosses also is permitted. Black sweatbands and piercings are a great way to top off the perfect Goth look. Makeup should be dark, but black makeup and pale skin is all a Goth needs to pull off the cosmetic look.

EMO

Emo music, like Dashboard Confessional or Early November, can be meshed with Goth, but there are distinct differences between the genres.

The typical emo supporter might wear tight jeans and T-shirts with a band name. To go above and beyond the typical emo look, hoodies (with the hood up), and a pair of Chucks are the way to look super emo. Graphic tees layered over a long-sleeved shirt and Vans shoes are also a way to go punk.

Kacie Davis, freshman in premed, said boys who have the emo style are more likely to wear women's jeans because they are tighter.

The hair and accessories are the key elements to looking emo. Side bangs are a must to pull off the look. Messy is good, and hair past the eyes is even better. Straight or spiky in the back is acceptable, and black with bleach-blond highlights is common. Wristbands, chains, white belts, studded belts, beanies and hats to the side are the perfect way to finalize the emo look.

When it comes to makeup, it should be less dramatic than Goth, but still dark. Black eyeliner is popular with this look, and color on lips to keep them from looking pale are also common. Not much makeup is necessary, because faces of people who are emo usually are covered with hoods or hair.

COUNTRY

Someone who is really into country music by artists like Brad Paisley or Reba McEntire might prefer a cowboy look. There are three clothing items to make this look, and they include boot-cut jeans, pearl-snap shirts and cowboy boots.

The modern cowboy takes the classic Western look and spruces it up a little. Instead of a button-up shirt, a nice, but subtle, graphic tee and a large belt buckle are the right touch to look like a modern cowboy.

A cowboy should not even think about hair because most have a hat. If the traditional cowboy hat is unavailable, a faded, beat-up baseball cap is quickly becoming an acceptable alternative. The most important element in hair is either keeping a natural look or covering it up with a hat.

The cowboy look is usually pretty easy to pull off, and when it comes to accessories and makeup, there is no exception. Makeup is unnecessary and might even detract from the look.

Michael Newth, freshman in mass communications, said some people might not realize they dress according to the music they listen to, especially country.

"People automatically expect someone who wears a cowboy hat to listen to country music," Newth said.

HIPPIE

The hippie clothing styles have come a long way since the 1960s, but the genre has never lost its key element: earthiness. Typical hippie music includes tunes by the Grateful Dead or Phish.

In the 1960s, tie-dye T-shirts, loose clothing and long straight hair with flowers and beads comprised the typical look. Today, hippie clothing still includes tie-dye shirts and multi-colored hoodies, but the bellbottoms have found their way out of style and cut-off pants have found their way in. Layered spaghetti straps, holey jeans, sandals – or no shoes at all – do the trick for a hippie look.

Hippies usually do not care what their hair looks like because outer appearance is not extremely important, and the accessory category has not changed dramatically over the years.

Most times, the accessories a hippie wears depends on their mood when they get dressed. Feathers, beads, bandanas and flowers are the typical accessories, but to limit them to those things is not OK.

For hippies, it is all about looking natural. Often, very little makeup is used to achieve the "natural" look.

POP

The pop princess looks good no matter what the occasion, time of day or mood. Also, the less clothing the better. Some of today's pop princesses include Gwen Stefani and Fergie.

Baby-doll dresses, a stylish pair of Daisy Dukes or ripped jeans with a pair of heels, and tops that are low-cut and revealing are related to the pop princess look. When it comes to an extravagant event, the best, this girl will wear the most expensive dress.

Her hair will look great whether it is down, in a ponytail, straight or curly. The bottom line: the hair will look perfect.

Note: While these are all common stereotypes, they cannot be held true for all people who choose to dress these ways. Not everyone wears clothes pertaining to their taste in music.

Creators of cult show release novelty album full of brutal metal

"The Dethalbum"
by Metalocalypse: Dethklok

Music review by Mark Sibilla

Sometimes I just need some great metal. I need the kind of metal that lets me headbang my troubles away. The kind of metal that deafens the ears as it simultaneously blows the mind. Apparently, Brendon Small ("Home Movies") agrees.

In 2005 and early 2006, Small teamed up with fellow comedy writer Tommy Blacha ("Late Night with Conan O'Brien" and "Da Ali G Show") and created a cartoon for the Cartoon Network's Adult Swim Sunday night cartoon block called "Metalocalypse." The show stars the five sociopathic members of Dethklok, a black metal band that is clueless outside of playing music, negotiating their contracts and judging whether or not something is metal enough.

Small and Blacha created the virtual metal band, Dethklok, which is composed of Nathan Explosion on lead vocals, Skwisgaar Skwigelf on lead guitar, Toki Wartooth on rhythm guitar, Pickles on drums and vocals and William Murderface on bass.

The duo decided to release an album of Dethklok songs with "The Dethalbum," which compiles songs featured during the first season of "Metalocalypse" episodes and fleshes them out into full songs that are an obvious homage to the metal lifestyle. The show uses these clichés – like excessive violence, nihilistic attitudes and selling out – to create a virtual band that writes songs that are as smart as they are stupid.

Like most shows on Adult Swim, it is difficult to explain the humor without actually seeing it for yourself. I think, in this case, the best thing to do is let the music speak for itself. While this is a novelty album, there is surprising substance in the music and lyrics that it makes secondary listens not only enjoyable, but also required.

Small and Blacha are smart individuals – Small is a Berklee College of Music grad – and they write smart songs that, while adhering strictly to a formula, manage to allow black humor and excellent musicianship keep them sounding somewhat ahead of the curve.

"The Dethalbum" opens with "Murmaider." After what sounds like the whistles of dolphins, chugging guitars enter combined with galloping drums (excellently played by Strapping Young Lad drummer Gene Hoglan) that lets the listener know this is gonna be some quality metal.

Nathan Explosion (voiced by Small) uses his perfect gruff, throaty vocals to tell the listener of the advantages of committing murder underwater: "There are no fingerprints deep under water/Nothing to tie one to a crime."

"Murmaider" is a ridiculously over-the-top song about murderous mermaids that has as much brusque metal posturing as it does ironic, eye-winking knowingness. What allows one to maintain enjoyment of the songs other than the lyrics is the outstanding instrumental prowess exhibited by Small and Hoglan. "Awaken," a song about waking the ancient lake troll Mustakrakish so he can conquer the land, is just plain silly. But when the lyrics are put in the context of the song – in this case, a racing thrash metal riff accompanied by jackhammer-like drumming – they take on a life of their own and create something absolutely brilliant.

The 15-song track list contains examples of metal clichés exploited and slipped on their head.

Songs like "Bloodrocuted" and "Hatredcopter" revel in metal's fascination with blood and violence.

"The Dethalbum" succeeds because it is a metal album that just happens to be funny. Small, Blacha and crew have created an album full of loud, boisterous guitars, thundering drum fills and biting black humor. If you have missed out on the Dethklok phenomenon, the album is a perfect introduction into the twisted "Metalocalypse."

Popular Science to feature tech dorm

By Adrienne DeWeese
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The world's largest science and technology magazine is on campus today and Friday with its mobile dorm room of the future.

Students can tour the hands-on, latest technology dorm room from 11 a.m. to 4 p.m. in Bosco Student Plaza. The room features technologies like a Blu-ray drive, a surround-sound system, a laptop and space-efficient modern furniture, said Ross Smith, Popular Science marketing and brand ambassador.

The tour features technologies from sponsors like Circuit City, Intel, Nivea for Men, TransWorld and WowWee. An Indy car simulator from the Indy Racing League also is on display.

"Other sponsors bought in to show what's new," Smith said.

Popular Science representatives selected K-State for its tour to encompass universities from the East and West coasts and the Midwest, said Emily Farris, marketing and brand ambassador. The tour features different diverse university campuses as well, she said.

"Each school that we're doing is completely different," Farris said.

Popular Science, along with JVC Company of America, is on its first university campuses tour, which started on Sept. 4 at the Georgia Institute of Technology in Atlanta. K-State is one of only 10 campuses — and the only university in Kansas — across the country that are stops on the "What's New National Tour."

About 20,000 college students at six universities already have experienced the "What's New National Tour," said Gary Tautphaeus, tour manager.

Students also have the opportunity to win raffles for prizes and can submit a 30-second video clip explaining the reason they deserve a new dorm room. The winner at each university receives a surround-sound system, and each university's runner-up receives JVC Marshmallow.

Mayor Tom Phillips was hoisted into the air high over Aggieville in a fire engine Wednesday. He vowed to stay in the air from 7 a.m. until the United Way campaign's Radiothon raised $30,000, according to a United Way news release.

Phillips stayed in the air until about 5:45 p.m. when the goal was reached. Maxine Coffey, director of the United Way of Riley County, said the final amount raised was $30,150.

Ninety feet below him in Triangle Park, Coffey and volunteers accepted donations for the campaign. She said each person who donated at least $15 could request a song from one of the four participating radio stations: KMAN-AM 1350, KMKF-FM 101.5, KXBB-FM 104.7 and KACZ-FM 96.3.

The mayor was not nervous about flying above Aggieville all day, Coffey said.

"He was gung-ho about it," she said.

Phillips said he prepared for the wait with a book and sunblock lotion.

"Heights don't bother me," Phillips said. "So far, I've been enjoying the view and waving at people as they honk."

Phillips said his wife, Debra

Phillips spent most of Wednesday in the basket high above Triangle Park. He was joined by a swarm of about 12 wasps that flew over from a nearby nest and threatened his challenge to stay in the basket. Phillips was not harmed by the wasps.

Phillips discussed how high he will be lifted over Triangle Park early Wednesday morning. Phillips stayed in the basket with various bathroom and meal breaks until $30,000 was raised at about 5:45 p.m.

Student body president wins philanthropy contest, wears pregnancy suit to class, Union

By Adrienne DeWeese
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Student body president Matt Wagner ditched his regular suit-and-tie outfit for a seven-month pregnancy suit Wednesday afternoon.

Wearing a white maternity T-shirt with the message "Yes, I'm a Wildcat, and no, you can't touch my belly!" Wagner, senior in management information systems, walked through the K-State Student Union and attended two classes while wearing an extra 40 pounds.

A Zeta Phi Beta fundraiser allowed students to monetarily vote for one of five men with prominent campus leadership roles. As the winner of last week's fundraiser, Wagner had to wear the pregnancy suit all afternoon.

It did not surprise Wagner that he won the fundraiser — in fact, he said he expected it.

During last week, Wagner said his fellow Delta Sigma Phi members donated money. Several students even contributed $20 each in Wagner's jar, said Corazon Ochanda, Zeta Phi Beta president and junior in nutritional sciences.

At last Thursday's Student Senate meeting, Wagner said he encouraged senators to contribute more money for Nick Piper, Student Senate chair and one of the five campus leaders in the contest. Piper received the second-highest total votes.

"I think that came back to bite me because people put money in mine instead of his," Wagner said.

While he said the pregnancy suit was not a burden, Wagner said he had a different mindset and thought process during the 2 1/2 hours he wore it.

"I definitely feel for women who've had children," he said. "I have a more compassionate understanding for what they go through during the pregnancy process."

Fifty percent of the about $150 raised last week will support Life Choice Ministries, and 50 percent will support Zeta Phi Beta, because it is a nonprofit organization.

"It was for a good cause and fundraiser," Wagner said. "I'm glad I was able to help them out and participate."

Life Choice Ministries, a name that encompasses the Pregnancy Testing Center, is a nonprofit organization that provides free and confidential pregnancy tests. The organization also provides women with information based on positive or negative pregnancy-test results, said Cindy Stipp, Life Choice Ministries assistant director.

"We're a very grace-filled, non-condemning safe place to be," Stipp said. "We want to get women to think about their goals and values."

Life Choice Ministries also facilitates private adoption arrangements with no personal financial benefits, as well as information about abortions and post-abortion healing, Stipp said. The organization also provides an abstinence program to high schools in Manhattan and surrounding towns, she said.

The money raised through last week's philanthropy will help with the facilities rental fees, pregnancy tests and different items for clients, Stipp said.

"We're very thankful that they would take the time to think of us and hopefully have some fun in the process," Stipp said about the fundraiser.

Satirist, musician performs in Forum Hall

By Whitney Hodgins
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A local comedian and songwriter addressed topics like Palestinian-Israeli relations to about 75 people Wednesday night in Forum Hall.

Dave Lippman, and three other musicians — political satirist George Shrub and a two-man band called Tyler Gregory and the Blue Shuffle — used humor to translate current international affairs for an audience of mostly college students.

Shrub introduced himself as "a Jew who disagrees with other Jews," and relayed information about Palestinian-Israeli relations to his admittedly uneducated audience by explaining the historical connection among the two countries and the United States.

"Israel and Palestine are the footprints for oil made by Britain and then carried over to the United States," he said. "These are such apocalyptic times and apocalyptic leaders. No wonder so many people want to go out and take all they can."

As Shrub sang, pictures of the Israeli and Palestinian conflict projected on a screen, with quotes from foreign leaders and philosophers like Chaim Weizman, Israel's first president; and Theodor Herzl, a Zionist leader. Occasionally the glow of bright clothing worn by the subjects in the photographs turned cold gray, juxtaposed beside black-and-white photographs of the Jewish Holocaust in World War II.

"Some folks call it ethnic cleansing, and some folks call it sociocide," he sang, tongue-in-cheek.

The Manhattan and K-State chapters of the Alliance for Peace and Justice were hosts of the free entertainment Wednesday night. Jeff Stille, K-State Alliance for Peace and Justice president, said the alliance made arrangements to accommodate and publicize the performance so students could hopefully learn about topics outside the mainstream media.

"It's important to consider these serious issues," said Stille, senior in secondary education. "Sometimes the best way to do that is with comedy."

Several Manhattan Alliance for Peace and Justice members said getting Lippman to perform at K-State was hardly a challenge because he has performed his act in Manhattan for about 30 years. Lippman was at LaborFest in City Park last month and also has performed at the Manhattan Arts Center.

While Lippman's stage presence was appropriately serious for the topics he covered, Shrub was able to loosen up the audience with his CIA persona, satirizing the hypocrisy behind U.S. politics.

"I know the weapons of mass distraction exist because I kept the receipt," he said in mockery of President George W. Bush. "In case you haven't noticed, you've been had."

The two members of the intermediary band, brothers Tyler and Todd Gregory, sang, strummed and drummed to lyrics like "Won't the side-walks bring us to our feet?," in a call to action for an audience that did nothing but clap along.

MAPJ member Greg Covington said he considered the three-piece set an entertaining enlightenment.

"I believe in adding comedy to serious topics," Covington said. "If it causes students to do a double-take, it's done its job by making people think about those subjects longer."

"The alliance encourages people to become more responsible and self-directing. A lot of people are fed information through convenience."

K-State police target minors drinking at football games

By Whitney Hodgins
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Another kind of team also will be at Snyder Family Stadium this season, but it plays by a different set of rules and regulations than the athletes on the field.

The K-State Police Department has created a special underage alcohol enforcement team to identify and arrest underage drinkers in the parking lots before and during football games. The three-member team was formed to decrease the number of students who are not yet 21 who drink anywhere on the grounds of the stadium, though specifically at tailgates. Capt. Don Stubbings said six students were arrested at the last home game against Missouri State, and the individuals were given notices to appear in court at later dates.

"Many disturbances in the stadium are drinking-related," Stubbings said. "We have the officers out there to lower the likelihood of fights and damage to property."

Stubbings said the task force will be at home games this season and will probably be around next season.

"We saw a decrease in the amount of visible underage drinking at the last game," he said. "Hopefully that was due to a conscious effort by minors not to drink illegally and wasn't just a matter of the fans hiding it better."

Student response to the enforcement team is varied. Jared Rizzo is the president of Greeks Advocating the Mature Management of Alcohol, a greek organization that speaks out against underage drinking and encourages responsibility among drinkers.

Rizzo, junior in marketing, said he agreed with the cause but is uncertain of its effectiveness.

"I applaud the police department's effort, but it might not be worth the trouble," Rizzo said. "It would take a lot of cops to make a difference since many people get drunk before they actually get to the games."

Students caught breaking the law were charged as minors in possession and received a fine. First-time offenders must pay a fine of $200, plus $135 in court costs, and will have their driver's license suspended. Second- and third-time offenders will be fined $300 and $400, respectively, and will face longer license suspensions.

"I don't think most students know how serious the consequences are," said Katie Gatlin, senior in women's studies. "This is a college town, so if people are drinking together and not creating problems for the rest of the crowd, I think they should just have to pour out their drink, rather than get arrested."

She said underage students will either stop tailgating or find ways to avoid the enforcement team.

"There's no reason for an entire task force to keep things under control because the pre-game scene is already under control."

Christian rights' 3rd party will make Democratic win easier

Rudolph Giuliani might win the republican nomination for president but lose one-third of the Republican support.

Social conservatives are threatening to form a third party if Rudolph Giuliani gets the nomination. In a party where social conservatives make up at least one-third of the voting population, to form a third party would be a profound statement of not only democracy — but stupidity. They would empower the left and destroy themselves.

With all this at stake, how might a former mayor of New York spark such a controversial split of such an old party? The answer is simple: he might support abortion, which is a deal breaker for social conservatives.

Giuliani has been extremely vague with his answers about where he stands on abortion. His public position is that he will appoint judges the people want.

On Oct. 1, National Public Radio reported a group of leading social conservatives in Salt Lake City, all members of an organization known as the Council for National Policy, voted a resolution stating if Giuliani is elected, they would consider forming a third party.

In an amazing display of democracy, and the freedom to further any belief, we have to wonder if this will help or hurt their cause.

Abortion is clearly a divisive and easily visible issue, but it isn't the only reason the Council for National Policy is upset.

On Oct. 1, MSNBC reported the council is unhappy with a number of issues and feels betrayed socially and economically by the Republican Party. MSNBC reported that while the target at the moment, these social conservatives aren't happy with any of the Republican frontrunners.

However, splitting from the Republican Party would be like shooting themselves in the foot. Splitting the Republican Party this close to a national election would ensure a victory for the Democratic candidate. Giuliani polls the best against Democratic Party candidate Hillary Clinton — the nightmare candidate for all social conservatives.

An Oct. 1 Los Angeles Times article described the history of the Republican Party since Ronald Reagan. For nearly three decades, the Christian right has been extremely dominant and successful in coming out on divisive issues like abortion, death penalty and education. Current conservative candidates, not reflecting these traditional viewpoints of the GOP, open the door for a third party.

Let's stop for a minute and say there is a third party entering the general election. Who would they run? With as wide open as the republican primary for president has been, why isn't there a staunchly social conservative candidate? It obviously isn't a lack of fundraising; surely there is enough funding behind the social conservatives and Christian right.

An Oct. 1 New York Times article answered this question. The Times made the observation that perhaps people are finally tired of the old divisive issues. Abortion has been on the political stage for a while and little has changed. People finally might be ready to move past it.

Issues like national security and the war in Iraq are becoming more popular. People at any time have the right to voice their opinion, but in this instance, the social conservatives need to be careful, or they just might destroy their only chance of winning in 2008.

Internet game shows business opportunity for future

It's a world where anything is possible. A person can get a new job, a new family and explore without inhibitions, all while moving only their fingers. It isn't a dream but the world of "Second Life."

A few days ago, a friend of mine with way too much time on his hands told me about this new virtual world he had discovered. He explained to me the intricate details of creating a character, called an avatar, and creating a new life.

It sounded ridiculous and a little stupid.

I told him a person's life had to have some serious disadvantages and hardships to warrant creating a fake life online.

Then, in the solitude of my living room, alone so no one could know, I ventured into this world of fake people.

"Second Life" is insane, and I mean that in the best possible way. Nothing is impossible when people control an entire world at their fingertips.

It begins by creating your avatar on their Web site, www.secondlife.com. A person chooses a first name, whatever their little heart desires, then chooses from a list of last names. Then, they download the software, log in — and bam — they are officially a part of "Second Life."

Once logged in, users are transported to the tutorial world, where they will run into other avatars who have no idea what's going on and simply run around bumping into each other.

Once the tutorial, which includes learning how to drive and fly, is finished it is time to enter the real world. Well — the fake real world — and what a world it is.

In "Second Life," a person can peruse job listings to find a way to make more Linden dollars, the currency of "Second Life."

These jobs include everything from working in a restaurant to being an escort. And, yes, a person can have sex in "Second Life." Like I said: endless possibilities.

If a person has a job, they actually must show up for their assigned shifts, and the expectation is to treat it almost as seriously as a person's real job.

You can meet new friends or meet up with your real-life friends. It is possible to get married, have a family and even attend classes from real-life universities, like Harvard. Your appearance is totally up to you, and you can make your avatar look like a mirror image of you or someone completely opposite.

According to a video tutorial for "Second Life," some real-world companies are even sniffing out the possibilities of the virtual world. Text 100, a public-relations company, built its own island in "Second Life" to hold virtual conferences and to further promote their brand.

It doesn't stop there. Games created inside the world have been sold and marketed to real-life companies. It's easy to see how this virtual world could be the future both for entertainment and business.

There will always be people who take it too far and give up their real life for "Second Life." The majority, however, will recognize this new development for what it really is — a way to learn, network, entertain and enjoy a new kind of life. My initial response to this new life was one of skepticism, but now, I stand corrected.

TO THE POINT

Faculty volunteers on right track

Manhattan Mayor Tom Phillips spent all day at the top of a fire engine ladder yesterday.

He waited there until citizens raised $30,000 for the United Way campaign.

We think it's great that city officials wanted to liven up the campaign with such an interesting activity, and the fact that it means so much to those in charge should really spur members of the community to opening their pocketbooks and donating to the cause.

The United Way's 15 agencies served more than 29,000 individuals in Manhattan and Riley County in 2006. In fact, 99 cents of every dollar raised went to support these members of our community.

This year, the United Way of Riley County has a goal of $1 million, and each year, K-State faculty members volunteer with the organization to raise funds as well.

Last year, K-State faculty members helped raise $100,000. While this is great, we know our proud Wildcat community can do even better. After all, their theme is "Wildcats United!"

Faculty members at Iowa State University — a university and community similar in size to K-State and Manhattan — raised $750,000 last year.

This raises the bar for our faculty donations.

Manhattan is growing rapidly, and there are individuals and families who need this support.

If each person who donated last year donates an additional 25 cents each day, the United Way would meet its goal.

We want to challenge the faculty to help the organization meet its goal.

In the end, it's just a quarter.

ASK THE 5TH YEAR

Dump your KU
boyfriend

Do you have any good excuses to get out of work?

Real excuses are the best. Take me for example. I went out and got Crohn's disease. It's just an excuse waiting to happen. Boss wants me to work over-time; sorry, I have Crohn's. Granted, I also have to suffer through the agony that is Crohn's, but is it worth an extra day or two off? Heck yeah.

ADAM
REICHENBERGER

A good excuse depends on how creative you are. A K-State student once downloaded ambient sounds from an airport, played it over their computer and called their boss claiming their flight was delayed. Ingenious.

One of my best friends choreographed us into a traffic scene complete with sirens, horns blaring and us yelling. He then called his boss and told him his car broke down on the highway. It was beautiful.

Practice, practice, practice. Try excuses on smaller things like club meetings. If it works, call it up to the big leagues.

It's an art form that should be passed on. Like Homer Simpson says, "Weaseling out of things is what separates man from the animals ... well, except the weasel."

Of course, quitting is always a good way to get out of work. For helpful quitting tips, see last week's column.

My boyfriend goes to KU. Do you have any tips for a long-distance relationship?

Yes. End it.

If your boyfriend goes to KU, he's probably an idiot anyway, so you might as well dump him.

Long-distancerelationships are a bad idea. My freshman year, when I was still young, vibrant, full of energy and had a rockin' body, I wasted it all on a long-distance relationship. I missed out on so many great times with my friends.

My roommates had a keg party in our dorm room (take that Goodnow Hall). Was I there? Of course not - I was back in Topeka.

You miss out on college when you're constantly limiting what you do or with whom you hang out for someone who isn't thinking about you anyway. And if you're not thinking about him either - why pretend?

Think about it. How long are you going to keep it up? Do you plan on staying together, living an hour and a half apart until you graduate? It's not going to happen.

Dump him, and if you can bake pie and don't talk that much, give me a call.

What are some ways to sober up quickly?

Well, according to the e-chug test found on K-State's Counseling Services Web site, there are no ways. Also, despite what my coworkers think, according to this gem of a test, I am not an alcoholic. Eat it. That test is a joke, though. They give you a neat certificate that makes you feel like you've won something. It's hanging on my wall adjacent to my DARE program certificate.

Talk about a joke. How about DARE? I read somewhere the majority of kids who do drugs learned all about them from DARE. Good job, guys.

As far as sobering up though, I really have no idea, but if you want my answer, here it is: butter, in stick form.

I wanna be a

Rock Star

Follow 3 easy steps to go from zero to pop-rock hero

So you want to live the good life, huh? Do you dream of illustrious wealth, Gotti jewelry and dating someone way out of your league? The life of the modern rock star is filled with dangers and deceit and babes and booze, but it lacks privacy and subtlety at the same time.

While some musicians still produce epic ballads and technically sound compositions, they are out-publicized and receive much less airplay in comparison to the numerous stereotypical shockstars in the United States' celebrity worship culture.

However, talent is not the key ingredient to superstardom. If you are willing to compromise your persona, friends and dignity, you too can make the public love you.

Leave your humility at the door, because the spotlight is no place for kindness or a genuine nature. Instead, pick up some eyeliner, designer jeans and a terrible haircut.

Your path to the top - or bottom - starts now ...

APPEARANCE

One of the most important elements of being a rock star is appearance. From the way rock stars present themselves down to the color of their nails - nothing can be left out.

First on the list for a rock star appearance is clothing. This outfit consists of tight leather pants and a crappy T-shirt - worn to make some rebellious point that no one cares about, like "American Idiot."

Next comes the Chuck Taylors - all rock stars wear them. The end. Wear them, or you are out.

More than just clothes are essential to completing that rock star look every garage band strives for.

Make-up - wait, what guy ever wore make-up? You're in a rock band, and it is all about the make-up. If you have more make-up than your fake, bimbo girlfriend, you're good. It is all about the thick black eyeliner and caked-on foundation. To match that hot eyeliner, don't forget the essential black nail polish.

Next on the list is the hair. There are two different routes one can take on this one: the long, greasy, wavy and stringy look (see Chad Kroeger of Nickelback) or for a more emo route, simply have a bad, lopsided hair cut, a lot of Jessica Simpson's relationship with John Mayer, like many celebrity relationships, did not last long.

For the Nickelback look, just skip the shower for a few days and you should be good. If all else fails, and you are out of ridiculous ideas, shave your head. Now, for this emo look, it is all about the hair gel. Slicking your locks straight down so that they stick to your face usually works well, or on the contrary, use the gel to make your hair stick up in any preferred direction.

Finally, when you are strutting around with alcohol in hand, ignore anyone in sight who does not have similarly high rock-star status. You have to brush off your old friends, the old girlfriends, and yes, even your mom. You are a rock star. Without the attitude, you can kiss your rock stardom goodbye.

MUSIC

One of the things that rock stars are most famous for is their music. Unfortunately these days, famous rockers seem to do more outside of the recording studio than inside, and this doesn't leave much time for singing and writing lyrics. Needless to say, many times the lyrics that are cranked out are not as good as they should be, and we get things like "RockStar" by Nickelback.

The first step in songwriting is getting an idea. You could be inspired by anything from an old photograph or a call from an ex fling. The next important thing to do is not let anyone tell you the idea you have for the song is bad. After that, the only thing left to do is wait around for a big label to come and change just about everything about your song, making it way better, before it is played millions of times on the radio.

When writing a rock song, themes and deep subjects are not necessary - but they help. Some bands, like Hinder and Nickelback, have songs that seem deep, but after listening to them, you will probably realize the songs only sound deep because of the grab-and-go music that plays behind them.

Songs like Hinder's "Lips of an Angel," a deep, emotional song about realizing you should get back with your ex, really aren't that cool because it is a difficult subject to write a good song about. The song also lost any artistic credit it had by being put, not only on a Hinder album, but on an album whose first track is titled "Get Stoned." Nickelback also took a similar path with every single song they ever recorded.

The moral of the story? To be a well-respected, popular rock musician - sell out.

THINGS NOT TO FORGET:

The stress of following the previous steps might be too much to deal with. In this case, here is a helpful list of things not to forget while on your path to fame.

— High-profile relationships that will never make it

These relationships should last preferably three weeks or less.

Jessica Simpson and John Mayer knew the formula. So did Pamela Anderson and Tommy Lee. Both couples were so in love, and both couples met their untimely relationship demise all too soon. But they're better off because this made them all better rockers.

— A clutch comeback plan

Rock stars like Jon Bon Jovi and Kid Rock have tried to reinvent themselves in the country music scene. Bret Michaels of Poison scored a new hit reality TV show on VH1, and Madonna picked up a new baby from Africa not too long ago. The common thread is they all are on the rockstar comeback path. Just make sure your comeback actions are oddly inventive enough for people to care.

— A sex tape you can secretly market for money

This is self-explanatory.

— Compiled by Eric Davis, Mike Kelly, Ashley Frey and April Newby

The band members of Good Charlotte each have lopsided haircuts that they style with gel.

Nickelback recorded a song about how to be a rock star, singing, "I'm gonna trade this life for fortune and fame/I'd even cut my hair and change my name."

MEN'S BASKETBALL

Bigger, better

Cats to play in KC in new Sprint arena

By Ryne Witt
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Bob Huggins left a lasting mark on the K-State program, and it wasn't just because of his abrupt departure from Manhattan. He left his mark on the men's basketball team scheduling.

The K-State athletic department announced yesterday that the men's basketball team's game against Florida A&M on Dec. 17 will be played in Kansas City, Mo., at the new Sprint Center.

"The whole idea started when coach Huggins was here," said Casey Scott, an assistant athletic director and administrator for men's basketball. "He was hoping it would be a marquee-match up."

Scott said once Huggins left, the topic was dropped until he had conversations with coach Frank Martin. They decided to pursue the idea, and then Scott called the Sprint Center and made arrangements for a game there.

The reason for the game being in Kansas City is that the area has a large alumni base and is a heavily recruited area, Scott said.

He said there is a significant cost to play there because of the rent and other items.

When asked about if this would be an annual event, Scott said it "depends on the amount of ticket sales."

In a K-State's Sports Information press release, Martin said he looked forward to the game.

"We think this is a great opportunity to give our fans and alumni in the Kansas City area a chance to see us play in a world-class arena," he said. "This is an area that we think is very crucial to the future of our program."

The Sprint Center has 18,500 seats and is part of the $4.5 billion revitalization of downtown Kansas City, according to the release.

According to Sprint-center.com, the arena "will help usher in a new era in sports and entertainment in Kansas City." It opens on Oct. 13 with an Elton John concert.

It has been 16 years since the K-State men's basketball team has played a neutral-site regular season game, according to the release. The last time was in December 1991 in the BMA Holiday Classic.

The game will not be included in the student season tickets package, but tickets will be available to them for $10. Non-student season ticket holders will receive their tickets in the mail. Other tickets for the game cost $25 and will be open to the public on Oct. 23 through Ticketmaster.

K-State has not announced its schedule for Fox Sports TV coverage, but Scott said it will be part of that 10 game package.

Florida A&M went 21-14 last year and made it to the NCAA tournament where they lost to Niagara University 77-69. Senior guard Leslie Robinson made 103 three-pointers last year. The Rattlers also fired their coach Mike Gillespie Sr. after the season and hired Eugene Harris.

Schedule diminishes KU's stats

Who do you think is the best player on K-State's football team?

The names that come to my mind are Ian Campbell, Jordy Nelson and Marcus Watts. I would even throw Josh Freeman into the conversation.

JONATHAN POTTER

OK, great. So we know there are some talented Wildcats who will be defending Snyder Family Stadium on Saturday, but isn't the in-state rival challenging K-State undefeated?

Kansas will make the trip to Manhattan with a 4-0 record – its best start since 1995.

There's a catch.

Kansas has played four games this season, but its previous opponents are struggling. Central Michigan is 2-3, Southeastern Louisiana is 1-3, Toledo is 1-4, and Florida International is 0-5.

I would give credit to Kansas' opponents if it was due. But it isn't.

The fact is, none of the four teams mentioned above have faced tough opponents themselves. Central Michigan's strength of schedule is ranked No. 65 by CBS Sports, and unfortunately for the Jayhawks, that game is considered their most difficult so far.

Toledo's strength of schedule is ranked at No. 72, while Florida International's is No. 86. All four have easy schedules, but they all still have losing records.

You might begin to believe me when I say the Jayhawks' opposition has been terrible. Several media outlets have noticed, as www.sportsline.com ranked Kansas' strength of schedule at No. 116 in the nation.

Maybe the Jayhawks aren't so good after all. Maybe they are just leading the end of the pack.

Still, Kansas must be doing something right, and they are.

The Jayhawks are ranked third nationally in both total offense and defense. They are ranked fourth in the nation in scoring, averaging 53.5 points per game. Their quarterback has thrown 11 touchdown passes. Their two main running backs have scored a combined nine touchdowns.

All of a sudden Kansas doesn't sound so bad anymore.

But if I had to pick a team that is more talented and seasoned for Saturday, the Wildcats are the obvious choice. The team already has faced two ranked opponents on the road, winning one of the games at then-No. 7 Texas.

K-State's defense intercepted Texas quarterback Colt McCoy four times and returned one for a touchdown. The Wildcats' special teams scored two touchdowns, while the offense scored two as well.

I always have thought teams have an advantage at home, and I still do. If nothing else, K-State fans will make it tough on the Jayhawks.

I have no hard evidence – save for a few ESPN highlights and game footage – but I believe K-State is a faster team than Kansas. K-State coach Ron Prince has put a premium on speed, and it has shown. If you don't believe me, just ask cornerback Justin McKinney.

How quickly the Wildcats' speed will humble the Jayhawks is unknown, but it will happen.

The Jayhawks' colors will be smeared all over Wagner Field, and they will mix to make one color – purple.

VOLLEYBALL | NO. 1 NEBRASKA 3, NO. 17 K-STATE 0, (30-16, 30-16, 30-25)

Squad suffers 1st sweep of season at No. 1 Nebraska

COLLEGIAN FILE PHOTO

The K-State Women's Volleyball team was swept by No. 1 Nebraska Wednesday night.

STAFF REPORT

Coach Suzie Fritz never tried to hide her game plan – let Nataly Korobkova swing.

Korobkova attacked 49 times during Wednesday's match against No. 1 Nebraska, finishing with a team-high 19 kills.

But it wasn't enough to keep the No. 17 Wildcats from suffering their first sweep of the season, a 3-0 (30-16, 30-16, 30-25) defeat to the top-ranked Cornhuskers.

Nebraska (13-0, 6-0 Big 12) has swept 15-straight Big 12 Conference opponents.

The Wildcats recorded their second loss in Big 12 play and move to 13-4 overall and 5-2 in the conference.

Nebraska came out swinging in game one, pulling ahead 4-0. The Wildcats would never pull the point spread closer. The Cornhuskers finished the game with a 10-4 run, holding K-State to just .031 hitting.

The Wildcats saw more red in game two, as Nebraska started the game with a 5-1 run. The Cornhuskers continued to roll, hitting .457. The game slipped away from the Wildcats when Nebraska scored eight of the last nine points.

Game three was the Wildcats' best chance to grab a win, as K-State led 22-21 late in the match. But Nebraska finished the game on a 6-3 run and won 30-25.

Though Fritz's squad could not steal a game from the Cornhuskers, the Wildcats are just the second Big 12 Conference team to score 25 points on Nebraska this season. The other was Texas A&M, which recently lost to K-State 3-1.

The Wildcats' hitting percentage improved in game three, but they still finished the match hitting .117.

Juniors Megan Farr and Rita Liliom both had six kills. Stacey Spiegelberg tallied her 22nd career double-double, finishing with a team-high 10 digs and 30 assists.

Spiegelberg and the Wildcats will return home to play host No. 7 Texas on Saturday at Ahearn Field House. Play is scheduled to begin at 7 p.m.

Campbell earns defensive player of the week from MCS

In the win over Texas, K-State junior defensive lineman Ian Campbell from Cimarron, Kan., had a 41-yard interception return for a touchdown. He also had two tackles and one quarterback hurry.

For his efforts he was awarded Master Coaches Survey Nike Game Ball and is the MCS' National Defensive Player of the Week.

The awards were given by 17 former college football coaches, who make up the Master Football Coaches advisory poll, who follow college football each week and review relevant game tape.

Campbell's return in the second quarter broke open a 7-7 game. K-State won the game 41-21.

Campbell also won Big 12 Conference defensive player of the week honors. Senior Jordy Nelson won the Big 12 award for offense.

Another award for the Wildcats was being named the Tostitos Fiesta Bowl National Team of the Week. Other schools up for the award were Auburn, Colorado and South Florida.

MAYOR | Funds raised to be divided among 15 local service agencies during the campaign. She said Phillips and Kennedy came up with this year's stunt.

"When we have the Radiothon — it's a great way to raise money for our agencies — but we also like to have fun," she said.

The radio stations accepted donations by phone as well as bids on Radiothon auction items. Contributors could bid on items like a ride around the stadium for the Harley Day Festivities at the K-State vs. Kansas football game this weekend, which sold for $1,000, Coffey said. Choosing the name of the new otters at the Sunset Zoo went for $225. A signed K-State game football went for $265, and an invite to a private tasting and tour of the new Kansas microbrewery, Tallgrass Brewery of Manhattan, went for $310.

The United Way will divide the money raised by the Radiothon campaign between 15 service agencies in Manhattan, Coffey said.

Radiothon is just one part of a larger campaign. The Radiothon's goal is $30,000, she said, but the overall goal is $1 million.

"This is quite a bit higher than last year's goal," Coffey said, which was $697,000.

The goal is higher for this year's campaign because the partnering agencies need more money. Coffey said the Manhattan Emergency Shelter turned away more than 50 people in September.

"There is a huge increase in need," Coffey said.

Phillips said he was happy to be part of the campaign because of what the United Way does for the people of Riley County.

"United Way is a wonderful organization for what they do for the community," Phillips said.

Bill Wisdom and Loleta

Sump, co-chairs of the K-State United Way Campaign Committee, volunteered at a booth in the K-State Student Union. They said people could make donations, and they would call in their song request for the Radiothon.

The K-State campaign focuses on university faculty and staff, Wisdom said. Employees receive a packet of information about how to donate at the start of the campaign. They can choose to send checks or cash, or they can have their donations billed from their salary.

He said the K-State effort usually raises about 17 percent of the total money donated to the United Way Campaign, which is their goal for this campaign.

"We don't set a specific money goal."

The first 500 employees to donate $100 or more will receive two free tickets to the Commerce Bank Wildcat Classic, a women's basketball tournament at Bramlage Coliseum, Dec. 1.

"The athletic department has generously donated," Sump said.

The United Way is a good organization to support because of the number of people it helps, Wisdom said.

"I like to donate to the United Way because it's easy, and it has the potential to help a lot of needs in the community," he said.

Nearly every cent donated goes to the agencies, Sump said, and very little of it is used for administration costs. Wisdom said people can choose which organization they want their donation to support.

"You can be sure more of your dollars are gonna go where they are needed," Wisdom said.

The K-State United Way Campaign group will have a table at the K-State Student Union every Wednesday in October from 11 a.m. to 2 p.m.

earbud headphones.

A grand-prize winner also will be selected from the 10 university top winners and will receive $5,000 in JVC electronics in mid November.

The entries are judged on creativity, Farris said. Students can submit comments and votes at www.popski.com/college, which will account for 25 percent of the votes. JVC panelists will judge the remaining 75 percent of votes, Farris said.

The technologies are available for students who reside in apartments as well, Farris said. The contest refers to dorm-room makeovers because the tour is college-oriented, and college students often are associated with dorm-room living arrangements, she said.

Smith said he encourages students to stop at the displays to learn more about the latest available technologies.

"If they see it, we encourage them to participate in the contest so they can win anything they see in the dorm room," he said.

projects with organizations that deal with pregnancy issues, like the March of Dimes, Ochanda said. The sorority started raising funds for Life Choice Ministries last semester after members heard feedback from women about how the organization helped them in the past.

"It was nice hearing that feedback from people, so we decided to do more with that organization," she said.

Ochanda said she wished the fundraiser had lasted longer so students had more time to learn about it.

"We didn't set ourselves any type of expectations," she said. "We thought it was fun, but we didn't know how everyone else would feel about it because it is a different type of fundraiser."

While the sorority received several negative comments about the nature of the fundraiser, Ochanda said most feedback was positive and she would like to continue the fundraiser.

"I think it was a good start getting people used to it," she said. "Some people thought it was uncomfortable while others thought it was creative. It was a good warm-up for the next time around."

Student organizations raise breast-cancer funds, awareness

By Amanda Keim
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Pink adorned the Weber Hall lawn as students united in the battle against breast cancer Thursday afternoon.

The Collegiate Cattle Women and Sigma Alpha, with support from the Women's Studies program, were hosts to a free barbecue on behalf of Susan G. Komen for the Cure. At the event, Students also gathered educational packets and purchased Tough Enough to Wear Pink T-shirts.

Crystal Young served as the chair of this year's event, and she said she thinks it is important to raise awareness for causes like breast cancer.

Last year, K-State raised $7,500 for breast cancer, and this year the total is about $8,000, said Young, senior in animal sciences and industry and agricultural communications and journalism.

"The barbecue is done every year," Young said. "It's sponsored by different businesses in the Manhattan community, and it's our way to say thanks for everyone's help that they've provided all week."

"Plus, we've got some great educational booths here from Susan G. Komen and from Lafene Health Center as well."

With the support of the community, Young said work on the project began in April, and meetings have taken place every week since August.

"It's kind of turned into my life this semester," she said. "It's exciting to see the payoff in the end. It's been worth it."

Teresa Carter, Mid-Kansas Affiliate of Susan G. Komen for the Cure president, said she has worked on the project for two years and again is impressed by the donations made by members of K-State community.

With last year's donation in combination with other sources, Carter said $300,000 was granted this year to the state of Kansas for breast-cancer screening for uninsured men and women. About $65,000 also was sent to Susan G. Komen for the Cure to conduct what Carter called "cutting-edge research."

"This is by far one of the largest fundraisers done by a third party," Carter said.

Susan G. Komen for the Cure has operated for 25 years and invested $1 billion into finding a cure. Carter said during the next 10 years, the foundation is dedicated to putting in another $1 billion.

Popular Science visits campus to showcase high-tech dorm

By Scott Girard
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Though it was hot and muggy outside Thursday afternoon, inside the "dorm room of the future" display outside the K-State Student Union, it was cool and hip.

The display, sponsored by Popular Science magazine, is part of a nation-wide tour of 10 college campuses to show students new technology available to them. The display also will be open to the public from 11 a.m. to 4 p.m. today in the Bosco Student Plaza.

The display room featured electronic technology like a $2,500 flat-screen television, Blu-ray drive, a surround-sound system, a laptop and space-efficient modern furniture.

JVC Company of America, the title sponsor of the tour, donated the electronics. Tents from other tour sponsors were set up around Bosco Student Plaza. They included activities like video games, free samples, prize drawings and a race simulation sponsored by the Indy Racing League, which will not be set up today, said Ross Smith, Popular Science marketing and brand ambassador.

Several students toured the dorm-room display and recorded 30-second videos about reasons they should win a $5,000-prize contest. One video at each university will receive a JVC package, and the 10 winners will be entered into a drawing for $5,000.

"The idea is that if you win the $5,000, you can theoretically get this room," Smith said.

While most students stopped by on their way to class, others stopped by because they were interested in Popular Science magazine.

"I saw them setting up yesterday, and I thought it would be a good idea to see what they had going on," said Stanley Badger, graduate student in electrical engineering.

Badger said though he lives in Jardine Apartments, he still has trouble fitting everything in his apartment.

"It's a very nice compact design," he said. "I actually asked them if that loft was for sale."

Badger was not the only student impressed by the loft, which included an attached desk, dresser and a bar to hang clothes from.

"It would be fun to have a bed and loft like that," said Brad Craemer, freshman in open option.

Craemer also said the room contained other neat items

Fort Riley community celebrates Oktoberfest

By Mayra Rivarola
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

This weekend's Oktoberfest means more than just beer and bratwurst to the Fort Riley community.

Gabrielle Leaman, marketing chief of Fort Riley events, said the event planners decided to start the first Oktoberfest for the soldiers who have been returning from Germany.

"This is a big family event," Leaman said. "We will be offering entertainment to the kids and original German food."

Jim Rose, event organizer, said the objective is to provide distraction for the soldiers who returned from Germany and an opportunity for them to bond with their families.

"We want to offer our community and troops a chance to forget about things and bring back the good memories they brought from Europe," he said.

The event starts at 5 p.m. Friday in the field next to

STUDENT GOVERNING ASSOCIATION

SGA to review Union funding structure

By Willow Williamson
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Student Senate introduced a bill that will create a special committee to review the K-State Student Union's funding structure at the Student Governing Association's meeting Thursday night.

"In the past five years, the Union has run on a deficit," said Student Body President Matt Wagner.

Nick Piper, senate chair, said the deficit averaged $166,636 during the last five years.

The Union Governing Board, the Union Corporate Board and the student government all will look at the issue, Piper said.

The purpose of the 19-member-committee — which Wagner said will consist of members from all areas on campus to gain different perspectives — will be to research the current funding structure of the Union and to look at other college's student unions to create a new strategy for funding.

TO THE POINT

Why K-State is better than Kansas

With the Sunflower Showdown coming to Manhattan on Saturday, the Collegian editorial board compiled a list of reasons why K-State is better than KU.

TO THE POINT is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

Our university isn't known as Shawnee Mission Far West.

Our football coach uses dance to stay in shape.

Our mascot is a real animal instead of a frontier verb meaning "to loot."

We travel across the country to support our athletic teams. (KU had to give back 275 non-purchased tickets from its allotment to this weekend's game.)

We have more than one good sports team.

K-State has been around longer than Kansas — older and wiser.

The K-State Alumni Association is No. 1 in the Big 12.

K-State's Landon Lecture Series brings in numerous notable speakers, including U.S. and foreign presidents.

Our color is royal purple. Enough said.

When Mangino asks how to get to Manhattan, people say, "keep eating."

K-State is one of the top 10 land-grant schools in the nation.

KU doesn't have an Aggieville — the oldest shopping district in the country, which is home to the oldest Pizza Hut in the world.

And let's face it: K-State students are simply smarter, funnier and better looking.

Court is now in session

New term will feature balanced Supreme Court justices

As the winds begin to pick up and the leaves change colors, it is time once again for the U.S. Supreme Court to go back to work after their summer vacation. With fear in their hearts, ignorant liberals are screaming the "conservative court" is going to dismantle all their work and cause it to come crashing down like dead leaves falling from a tree. Yet the extreme left-wingers and the right-wing Bible thumpers need to realize not much is going to change.

BRETT KING

For all their fears, the Supreme Court has yet to become a "conservative court." This current Supreme Court might produce many close 5-to-4 decisions during this term, but these results stem from having close to a balanced court.

According to a Sept. 19 Gallup Poll, 64 percent of U.S. citizens believe the Supreme Court is about right to too liberal.

Apparently, neither the Gallup Poll-takers and folks over at the Daily Kos understand there is no such thing as conservative and liberal on the Supreme Court.

Yes, each member might follow a personal ideology, but the difference lies in the interpretation of the laws.

Those scary "conservative" justices tend to follow a literal interpretation of the Constitution based on the meaning of the words written, and they also take into account the context in which the Amendments were written.

Liberal or moderate judges see the Constitution as a living document, subject to change and open to influence even from foreign laws.

At the Woodrow Wilson International Center for Scholars in Washington, D.C., Justice Antonin Scalia explained what a moderate judge was when he said, "What is a moderate interpretation of the text? Halfway between what it really means and what you'd like it to be ... The moderate judge is the one who will devise the new Constitution that most people would approve of."

Christina Forsberg | COLLEGIAN

According to the American Bar Association, the Supreme Court will address many controversial issues this term, including the issues of requiring an ID when casting a ballot to prevent voter fraud, lethal injection procedures, suing third parties representing companies found guilty of securities fraud, habeas corpus, death penalty for child molesters, and possibly the Washington, D.C., handgun ban, which would establish a clear definition of the Second Amendment.

The current court is composed of four justices who follow a strict interpretation of the Constitution — Chief Justice John Roberts and Justices Scalia, Clarence Thomas and Samuel Alito. Another four follow the living document interpretation — Justices Stephen Breyer, John Paul Stevens, Ruth Bader Ginsburg and David Souter.

This leaves Justice Anthony Kennedy, who has sided with the living document interpretation many times, as the pivotal vote.

Contrary to what the Boston Globe might have printed in an article on Oct. 1, Kennedy does not have many conservative views. For years, he and former Justice Sandra Day O'Connor were like two peas in a pod swinging back and forth but generally following lock step with the moderate judges.

Justice Kennedy has sided with left-leaning judges in many controversial cases like Kelo v. City of New London, Lawrence v. Texas, Romer v. Evans and Roper v. Simmons. In the court opinion for Roper v. Simmons, Justice Kennedy wrote about laws in European countries and allowed these laws to dictate and circumvent our Constitution.

This term of the Supreme Court will not be the earth-shattering session people think it will be. Not much is going to change in the realm of precedence; Civil Rights Acts of 1866 and 1964 will remain intact, women still will have access to abortion, and we aren't bringing back "Old Sparky" as a form of execution.

Stop complaining and enjoy reading opinions from some of the most brilliant legal minds in the country.

Candidates need to reach out to Hispanic population in U.S.

The Hispanic voting block quickly is becoming a powerful force in U.S. elections.

Yet some candidates feel like their hands are tied when trying to reach this group.

Seven presidential hopefuls, all members of the Democratic Party participated in a Sept. 9 debate sponsored by Univision, a Spanish-speaking TV Network.

The participants were asked questions in Spanish that were translated into English, and then the answers were given in English and translated back into Spanish.

Gov. Bill Richardson, D-N.M. was not exactly thrilled about the rules and regulations of the debate at Florida's Miami University.

Richardson is Hispanic and was not allowed to speak Spanish during the debate.

"I'm disappointed today that 43 million Latinos in this country, for them not to hear one of their own speak Spanish, is unfortunate," he said.

Univision had the debate on its station, though the discussion was at times confusing and disorganized to the point of hilarity.

Richardson, along with Chris Dodd, D-Conn., speaks fluent Spanish, a skill oddly useless in the debate because of the regulations.

On several occasions, when asked a question by the debate's moderators, Richardson asked — in Spanish — if he was allowed to answer in Spanish. He was told, as he knew he would, that he could not.

All in all he seemed to take it in stride, smiling into the camera as if asking was just a polite attempt to understand the rules. Dodd made almost no reference to the issue.

The debate was one of the first major attempts to reach the estimated 17 million Hispanic voters living in the United States on their own terms.

According to Nielson Media Research ratings, the debate caught the attention of 2.2 million viewers. Though less than Fox's last major Republican debate's estimated 3.2 million viewers, it is definitely a progressive step.

As America's largest minority, the Hispanic population is about 44.3 million, according to USA Today, and the Hispanic vote could be extremely important in the upcoming election. In light of this, Univision has offered to sponsor a second debate broadcast in the same fashion for the leading members of the Republican Party. All those invited, excluding Sen. John McCain, have declined.

Though not necessarily groundbreaking when it came to the issues, the debate was without a doubt symbolic of the changing nature of the American voter. The issues were predictable — immigration, immigration, Iraq and well ... immigration. Every one of the contenders said they would, "overhaul" immigration laws according to the BBC on Sept. 10.

With the constant changes in the way information travels, it is high time campaigning traditions changed. Any candidate who does not change almost certainly will fail.

The presidential hopefuls pay thousands of dollars to campaign advisers and managers — people who should know what to do to win. It is up to the individual candidates to open their minds to new avenues, and reach out to people they never have before.

FRIDAY FACTOID

K-State students push over a 1968 Volkswagen during the 1986 Aggieville riot following a 29-12 win over the University of Kansas.

Rioting ensues in Aggieville after games between K-State, KU in 1980s

Is it true there were riots in Aggieville in the 1980s after we beat KU?

In 1984 and 1986, the intensity and celebrations from the K-State rivalry with KU moved from the football field to Aggieville.

In 1984, after the 3-7-1 Wildcats defeated the Jayhawks, fans stormed the field to tear down the goal posts.

They were met by several security officers, who used pepper spray on a few students and cleared out the crowd.

Later that night, 8,000 people, mostly students, celebrated in Aggieville. The large crowd got rowdy, eventually injuring 21 students and six police officers. One officer was reportedly stabbed in the arm, and others were hit with rocks and had bottles thrown at them.

A Riley County Police Department sergeant at the time classified the situation as follows: "There were too many students, too much beer and too small an area." Two years later, the Wildcats beat KU 29-12, one of their two wins of the season.

That night students again flooded Aggieville, breaking 41 business windows and smashing hundreds of beer bottles. Several students even overturned

KC symphony, chorus to perform as part of 2007-08 McCain series

By Adrienne DeWeese
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A metropolitan symphony and chorus will feature the fourth performance in the 2007-08 McCain Performance Series Sunday night at McCain Auditorium.

The Kansas City Symphony last performed as part of the McCain Performance Series about 15 years ago, said Thomas Jackson, McCain marketing and development director. However, the symphony and Kansas City Symphony Chorus performed as part of the Symphony in the Flint Hills series several years ago, Jackson said.

"There were many people who weren't able to attend the Symphony in the Flint Hills so we decided to bring the symphony and the chorus as a double treat," he said.

As of Wednesday, K-State student tickets for the performance now are offered for $5 instead of $20. Todd Holmberg, McCain executive director, said he decided to offer student tickets for $5 to encourage students to learn about what the McCain Performance Series has to offer.

"I wanted them to have no excuses to see one of the nation's finest orchestras right here at McCain," he said. "It's really a wonderful opportunity, and I wanted them to have every advantage."

The symphony's performance includes Gioacchino Rossini's "Overture to the Barber of Seville" and Ludwig van Beethoven's "Symphony No. 2." The Kansas City Chorus also will join the symphony for "Durufle Requiem."

The 80-member Kansas City Symphony was founded in 1982, several months after the dissolution of the Kansas City

Philharmonic. The symphony performs subscription, educational, touring and outreach concerts during its 42-week session each year, according to the symphony's Web site. The Kansas City Symphony Chorus has existed in the Kansas City metropolitan area for more than 40 years, first as the Mendelssohn Choir and then the Civic Chorus. The choir became the Kansas City Symphony Chorus in 1988, and it is the choral voice of the symphony with between 55-85 members.

Giancarlo Guerrero, Oregon's Eugene Symphony music director, will guest conduct on Sunday's program. Holmberg said guest conductors offer a different dynamic to the symphony's performance.

"The dynamic that it gives to the show will come out of the musicians more so than the conductor," he said. "The musicians really appreciate a change of pace from their usual conductor and are often more engaged because a guest conductor brings a new energy and new ideas to an orchestra."

An instrument "petting zoo" also will take place prior to Sunday's performance and during intermission. It is the first time the McCain Performance Series has offered a petting zoo, Jackson said.

"So many people have looked at the instruments but never touched them and been up close and personal with them," he said. "It makes a huge difference when you have that."

Symphony members will provide their instruments for the zoo, but more expensive instruments like bassoons and contrabassoons will not be on display, Jackson said. K-State graduate students of music will discuss the instruments and answer audience members' questions.

"When they hear the difference on stage, they'll be able to understand how difficult it is and why it takes 15 to 20 years to perfect the craft of the instrument," Jackson said.

A pre-performance lecture will take place at 6:30 p.m. Sunday in All Faiths Chapel. Gary Mortenson, head of the Department of Music, will discuss the concert's music, the composers' backgrounds and the historical periods of the pieces' composition.

Frank Byrne, Kansas City Symphony executive director, said a many college-age people attend the symphony's concert in Kansas City, Mo.

"I would like us to have an ongoing relationship with the major universities in Kansas and Missouri," he said. "I think every young person who is at any college or university should have the experience of hearing great music performed live, whether you're a music student or not."

The symphony's program for Sunday's performance contains several of the most beautiful pieces of music ever written, Byrne said.

"There are all kinds of emotion in this music," he said. "There's a little something there for everyone, and we're just very happy to be on campus."

Wamego's annual OZtoberFest to feature original Munchkins, 13 Judy Garland dresses

By Emily Sterk
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

"The Wizard of Oz," is taking over Wamego this weekend for the third-annual OZtoberFest.

The weekend's events feature a visit from original Munchkins from the film who will be available for autographs and who will make cameo appearances in the stage production. Other activities include exhibits for everything "Oz," and Judy Garland's youngest son, Joe Luft, will be present for the three-day festival, said

Ellie Coots, gift shop manager of the OZ Museum.

"The festival is a celebration of the story and history of the book," Coots said. "It is a celebration of an American fairy tale."

Coots said an exhibit of 13 dresses worn by Judy Garland, who played Dorothy in "The Wizard of Oz," will be on display at 10 a.m. Saturday at the Columbian Theater in Wamego.

She said Michael Siewert, who owns the dress collection will have an interview with original Munchkins from the film before the stage production of "The Wizard of Oz."

Betsy Riblett, curator for the festival, said there will be a red-carpet ceremony for Ruth Duccini and Karl Slover — original Munchkins from the 1939 film — 9 a.m. Saturday at the Columbian Theater.

"Duccini was a villager, and Slover was a trumpeter and sleepy-head," Riblett said. "The actors who played the Munchkins are getting older, so we are so grateful some are still able to make it to the festival."

Riblett said the festival is a family event, and activities like inflatable playrooms are available for children. Participants can meet author Roger Baum, great-grandson of L. Frank Baum, who wrote "The Wonderful Wizard of Oz" on which the film and play are based, and other books including "Dorothy of Oz." Others present for book signings will be Gina Wickwar, author of "The Hidden Prince of Oz," and the illustrator of her books, Anna-Marie Cool.

"The Wizard of Oz" production and exhibits in the OZ Museum are open to all.

More than 2,000 artifacts dating back to 1900 when L. Frank Baum wrote his book, are in the Oz museum, which opened in 2004, according to its Web site, www.ozmuseum.com.

Coots said the museum is in Wamego because the owner of the memorabilia, Tod Machin, was born and raised in Wamego.

Riblett said the festival is not only fun, but it gets Wamego noticed and promotes the town.

"Lots of people from out of state come to the festival,

Squad to face No. 7 Texas at home before bye week

By Joel Jellison
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Following its loss to No. 1 Nebraska Wednesday, you might think the K-State volleyball team would need a break.

But it won't get any easier for the Wildcats on Saturday night at 7 when they play No. 7 Texas at Ahearn Field House.

The Wildcats (13-4) didn't choose to play two top-10 teams in the same week before the season. The Big 12 Conference schedule is simply computer-generated based on different criteria.

"It's random," said K-State head coach Suzie Fritz. "It's computer-generated based on the fact that you try to keep the Wednesdays in geographic proximity. So it's computer-generated based upon a series of criteria."

It might work out to the Wildcats' advantage to have drawn two tough opponents in one week, as they will get a break next week when they have a bye on Wednesday.

"We get two ranked teams, but at the same time our bye week comes next Wednesday," said Fritz. "If we can get through this week and we can power through this week, then we will get a little rest and recovery going into Iowa State next Saturday."

The bye week comes at a good time for the Wildcats, who have played a competitive schedule thus far, including three tournaments before conference play started.

"Some teams choose maybe not to play two matches in one day, some teams choose to just play single matches," Fritz said. "We felt like, with this team, we wanted as many competitive experiences we could get to try and prepare us for the league."

The off day next week will give the Wildcats time to get refreshed before they start another block of Big 12 matches.

"Recovery is such an important part of being healthy, and staying healthy is such an important part of being successful," Fritz said. "This bye week comes at a good time for us to get some rest, get our legs back."

K-State struggled in the first two games against Nebraska on Wednesday.

Fritz said Nebraska exposed the Wildcats slow start and made them look bad in the early matches.

"We don't have the luxury of starting like we started in that match," said Fritz. "That is a team that can make you look bad in a hurry if you don't come out with effort, enthusiasm, execution early in the match."

Texas is 9-3 on the season and ranked No. 7 in the nation.

The Longhorns have won the last seven matches against K-State and nine of the last 10 meetings to lead the overall series 17-7.

K-State last beat Texas in a home match during the 2003 season.

Fresh off being swept by No. 1 Nebraska, the K-State volleyball team must turn around and play No. 7 Texas this weekend.

'Bleeding purple' taken seriously

Many people on this campus claim to bleed purple.

However, what defines a true K-State fan? Have you ever wondered if you are a true K-State fan? Here are a few rules that should apply to every die-hard Wildcat.

— If you don't know all the words to "Wildcat Victory," you're not a true fan. If you don't even know what "Wildcat Victory" is, you should probably either get a clue or transfer. Now.

— In the song, "Wildcat Victory," one key line is, "Faithful to our colors we shall ever be," which brings me to my next point: there should be none of this wishy-washy, namby-pamby stuff about switching sports alliances by season. You root for K-State. If you feel you must have another Division I-A allegiance, for the love of Pete, pick a school outside of the Big 12 Conference.

— If you root for Kansas (even in basketball), you cannot be considered a true Wildcat. Sorry.

— When you go to any sporting event at K-State, you Wabash. You Wabash every time the song plays, no matter how badly the Wildcats are losing. You Wabash even if you're sitting with your parents in a section where everyone sits down and no one else does it.

— Fainting is an acceptable response if K-State:

A: is ranked
B: beats a Top 10 team in any sport

C: beats a Top 10 team by more than 14 points

K-State has a long and storied history of choking in clutch games or in the fourth quarter of a football game, so when K-State pulls off amazing victories, you first sit and stare at the TV (or at the game, wherever you might be watching it) and wonder, "Did that really happen?" Then you celebrate.

— You know in your heart that one day, KU will go down to K-State in Bramlage.

— You open your dresser (or closet) and see that 75 percent of your wardrobe is purple. You even have purple dress shirts to wear to church on Sunday after K-State victories.

Another addition to this one: your room looks like a purple people eater exploded in it. Between the purple comforter on your bed, the Wildcat border and K-State posters from basketball programs adorning your walls, even down to the purple towels in your bathroom, no one can even dispute that you are a true Wildcat.

— You didn't apply to any school other than K-State. You knew that you'd fit right in with everyone else here because, let's face it, we're all we have.

— No matter where you go after K-State, you'll always be a Wildcat.

For true Wildcat fans, K-State will always be in our hearts. Convert as many as you can, and don't forget to pass on the purple pride to future generations.

Despite being forced to learn a new scheme, the Wildcats are ranked third in the Big 12 in scoring defense and total defense.

Wildcats buying into Tibesar's 3-4 scheme

By Mike DeVader
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State's new 3-4 defense is off to an eye-opening start in its first four games of the 2007 season.

Tim Tibesar, K-State's new defensive coordinator, was responsible for implementing the new system. After serving as special teams coach last season, Tibesar was promoted when former defensive coordinator Raheem Morris left to rejoin the Tampa Bay Buccaneers.

Tibesar was a defensive coordinator at North Dakota for two years, where he constructed one of the stingiest Division II defenses.

Mike Mannausau, inside linebacker coach and co-defensive coordinator at North Dakota, said the 3-4 defense was designed to create havoc for opposing offenses.

"There are lots of different types of defenses you could run in the 3-4, which gives leverage to the defense over the offense," Mannausau said. "The defense can adapt to any offense easily, making it extremely hard for the offense to gain yards."

The 3-4 defense involves a team having three down linemen up front. The linemen's job in this scheme isn't necessarily to get pressure but to occupy blockers. Pressure is a plus, but taking up blockers allows the defense behind the line to be more effective.

Behind the linemen there are four linebackers. One or two linebackers can line up at the line of scrimmage before the snap, which enables the linebackers to choose between blitzing and dropping back into coverage.

Behind the linebackers are two safeties and two cornerbacks.

Safeties are touted as the last line of defense on a play. They are also instructed to read offensive formations and decide whether to stay in the assigned coverage. Corners are meant to cover the opposing team's wide receivers and help with run support. Both safeties and cornerbacks have the option of blitzing unexpectedly at any time.

With K-State's rejuvenated speed on defense, the Wildcats were able to shut down Auburn for three and a half quarters, yielding only 291 yards of total offense. They were successful at getting to quarterback Brandon Cox, sacking him five times and knocking him down eight other times. The secondary also picked off two passes.

The defense yielded only 62 yards rushing, on 37 carries, to one of the best rushing teams in the SEC. Auburn accumulated only 1.7 yards per rush, something the Tigers have done only twice since the end of the 2005 season.

Against San Jose State, the Wildcats allowed only 293 yards of total offense. They managed to sack the Spartan quarterbacks three times but did not force any turnovers. The run defense allowed 73 yards on 31 attempts, which is an average of 2.4 yards per rush.

Missouri State came to Manhattan on Sept. 15 and was unable to find success against the Wildcat defense. The Bears accumulated only 191 yards of offense, including 69 yards rushing on 40 carries. The Wildcats also had five sacks.

The team had a week off before playing Texas on Saturday, and the defense frustrated the Longhorns the entire game. Texas is one of the top rushing teams in the Big 12 but was limited to 113 yards on 32 carries.

McCoy continually found himself on the turf after being hit multiple times and being sacked once. A hard hit in the first half left McCoy with a mild concussion.

If the first four games are any indication, K-State's defenders have bought into Tibesar's scheme, which is no surprise to Mannausau.

"Tim had been involved in this type of defense his whole life, and since he's a great football mind, the performance versus Auburn didn't shock any of us here at North Dakota," Mannausau said.

Madness returns to Manhattan

The K-State basketball teams will start their seasons with Madness in Manhattan, Oct. 12 at Bramlage Coliseum.

The event will feature a dunk contest, a 20-minute scrimmage and comments from first-year head coach Frank Martin.

The event is free and open to the public. Doors will open at 10:30 p.m. and the event will begin as soon as fans are in the arena.

Tennis team keeps same lineup for 2nd fall tourney

The K-State tennis team will compete in its second fall tournament today through Sunday at the Hoosier Classic in Bloomington, Ind.

Teams competing this weekend are Georgia, Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Kansas, Vanderbilt and Western Michigan.

The Wildcats' singles and doubles lineup will be the same as the opening fall tournament two weeks ago in Tulsa, Okla. The squad will include senior Viviana Yrureta (2-1 singles record), junior Katerina Kudlackova (0-3), sophomore Natasha Vieira (1-2), and freshmen Pauline Guemas (1-2) and Antea Huljev (1-2). The doubles teams for this weekend will be Huljev-Kudlackova (2-1) and Vieira-Yrureta (1-2).

Yrureta has been the Wildcats' leading singles player this season. The product of Puerto Ordaz, Venezuela, finished the Hurricane Invitational with a 2-1 record, capped by a 6-4, 6-3 win over Yawna Allen of Oklahoma State. The Wildcats' freshmen also concluded action at the Hurricane Invitational with wins on the final day, as Guemas defeated Corinne Langston of Oral Roberts, 6-1, 6-2 and Huljev dropped Emily Arkell of Oral Roberts, 6-0, 6-0.

Following this weekend's action, K-State will have a week off before making a return trip to Tulsa, Okla., for the ITA Central Regionals on Oct. 17-21.

Fans should be wary of fake tickets at Saturday's game, KSU officials say

With all tickets sold for Saturday's Sunflower Showdown, athletics officials today warned fans still seeking tickets to be certain of their authenticity before purchasing.

"Often in these high-demand situations fans wind up with unauthorized tickets," said Robin Fosha, director of ticket operations. "It's truly 'buyer beware' if someone purchases a ticket from a source other than our ticket office."

K-State uses an electronic ticket scanning system which can detect counterfeit, stolen or tickets already in use. Fans holding a ticket which is scanned invalid will be denied admission, and in the case of fraudulent or stolen tickets, might be detained.

Kickoff is scheduled for 11:08 a.m. Saturday.

Parking lots around Snyder Family Stadium open at 6 a.m. Stadium gates open at 9 a.m.

Local fire departments to raise prevention awareness next week

By Jelani Yancey
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

No fire-related deaths have occurred in Manhattan in the last two years, said Manhattan Fire Marshal Jim McDiffett. During National Fire Prevention Week, local fire departments will make sure things stay that way.

McDiffett said Fire Prevention Week is Oct. 7-13, starting with an open house from noon to 4 p.m. Sunday at Manhattan Fire Department Headquarters, located at 2000 Denison Ave.

On campus, the Manhattan Fire Department will team up with K-State's Public Safety Division all week to pass out informational pamphlets said K-State Fire Marshal Randy Slover.

"It's better that you come see us than that we go see you," McDiffett said.

The theme of this year's

Fire Prevention Week is "Practice Your Escape Plan." Recalling a fire in 2003 at a Rhode Island nightclub that killed 100 people and injured nearly 200, McDiffett offered a tip to anyone at restaurants, bars, clubs or other business establishments: always identify a second exit as soon as you enter.

"It's a good thing to know, not just for criminal situations but also in life," he said.

Firefighters will be on campus from 10 a.m. to 3 p.m. Oct. 8 at Van Zile Hall and from 10 a.m. to 3 p.m. Oct. 9-10 at the Bosco Student Plaza. They will be at K-State-Salina from 10 a.m. to 3 p.m. Oct. 11 northwest of the College Center.

In addition to handing out literature, firefighters will demonstrate how to use some safety equipment, like fire hoses, fire extinguishers and scuba gear. They also will field questions about fire inspections, housing issues and other topics related to fire prevention, McDiffett said.

"We get fire safety out there to the public," Slover said.

Other activities include fire engine displays. Slover said Phi Kappa Alpha Fraternity will show an antique truck, and the Manhattan Fire Department will display a contemporary fire engine Oct. 8-11.

Firefighters also will give door prizes and free hats, Slover said.

Phone companies scam customers with unauthorized charges on bills

By Brandon McAtee
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Recently a scam by telephone companies has been brought to the attention of many consumers.

This scam is known as cramming. The Federal Communications Commission defines cramming as the "practice of placing unauthorized, misleading or deceptive charges on the consumer's bill."

Typically, crammers rely on confusing phone bills that will trick the consumer into paying for services that are unauthorized or not received, according to the FCC. They also charge the consumer more for something than they originally suggested.

Cramming charges might include text-message updates, ringtones, voice-mail services or club memberships, but most often cramming comes by way of 800 numbers, according to the FCC.

The scam will appear on a bill as "service fee," "service charge," "mail service" or "membership." If any of these appear on a bill, the FCC suggests that consumers contact their phone company immediately.

Jennifer Vanschoelandt, senior in finance, worked for a company that dealt with items like these.

"I used to be in charge of looking over bills," Vanschoelandt said, "and outside companies would add stuff for $29.99, and I would call them and they would have to put outside credit or something back on it," she said.

The FCC's Truth-in-Billing Rules require telephone companies to provide clear, non-misleading, plain language in describing services for which consumers are being billed.

Telephone companies also must display on each bill one or more toll-free numbers that customers could call to dispute any problem on their bill.

"Manhattan T-Mobile Manager Joe Guillory said the company does not add fees like these to customers' bills.

"If a problem is noticed on a phone bill, anyone can come in, and we will explain any unknown charges, fees and taxes in question," he said.

Brittany Kuykendall, senior in sociology, said she

ADDITIONAL INFO

Kansas Attorney General Paul Morrison and the FCC suggest many ways to help protect against cramming.

- Look over any phone bill every month very carefully. Treat it as any other major consumer purchase, like a credit card bill.
- Ask about any charges that are unrecognizable.
- Keep a record of services and 900 numbers that have been authorized and used.
- Read the fine print of any promotional material that has been signed.
- If a consumer has been crammed, along with contacting their phone company, they also should file a complaint with the FCC on its Web site, www.fcc.gov/cgb/complaints.html.

had not heard about cramming before.

"I have never really checked my bill before, but something like this will certainly make me better about checking it," she said.

"It just doesn't seem right that a company could do that, and I would not want to be associated with a company that has anything to do with it."

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

PAGE 8

By Sydney Eagleton
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Picture this: a guy is ready to propose. The scene is set, the dinner went perfectly, and the sun is setting on the horizon.

He goes down on one knee, pulls out the box and asks the question she's been waiting to hear for months.

He tries to slide it on her finger, but it gets stuck about halfway down — it's too small. What's a guy supposed to do?

There are several steps to follow when purchasing an engagement ring. First, decide on a budget before walking in a jewelry store.

"Two months' salary is the generally accepted rule for what to spend on an engagement ring," said Charles Elliott, president of Reed and Elliott Jewelers. "But number one is what the man can afford. A young man knows what he can spend."

Finding the right ring size also is important. According to diamonds.com, the average woman's ring size is a size six, and it also is the stock size in jewelry stores.

Therefore, if the fiancée-to-be has tried on rings from a display case, and they seem to fit, it is fairly safe to assume she is a size six.

There are other tricks to find out a woman's ring size.

"If she has a ring that she wears on that finger, offer to take it in to be polished and then get it sized," Elliott said. "Or a guy could have one of her girlfriends borrow a ring for a night and get the size from that."

If the two have been together for a while, there is an opportunity to think ahead to when an engagement ring might be needed.

"I got (my fiancée) a promise ring a while back, and I remembered the size for that one," said John Huffstetler, fiancé of Hayley Martin, senior in hotel and restaurant management. "Just get her a little promise ring that says, 'Hey we're together,' and you can get the size from that."

Once the right ring size is found, the hard part comes: finding the right ring.

When it comes to shopping for diamonds, the four C's are always helpful. Out of cut, color, clarity and carat, cut is the most important, Elliott said.

"Cutting makes the diamond sparkle," Elliott said. "Too thin — light goes out the bottom. Too deep — light goes out the sides. So the beauty of the diamond is lost. The surface may be bigger if it's thinner, but it's not as beautiful. Bigger is not better."

The more colorless the better, but most color changes are undetectable, according to diamonds.com.

Clarity has to do with imperfections and flaws on or within the diamond. Most are internal and can only be seen with a microscope. As long as the diamond is flawless to the naked eye, it is fine, according to a Sept. 30 MSN.com article.

It doesn't hurt to do a little research before going in, but if one chooses the right jeweler, they should explain what the buyer needs to know and not confuse them with jargon.

"The jeweler was really helpful," said Huffstetler. "I sat down with her, and she explained cut and clarity to me and was really helpful."

Carat is the actual weight of the diamond, and it depends on the setting and shape of the diamond.

Because larger diamonds are harder to find when mining, a two-carat diamond would not be the same price as two one-carat diamonds.

There is also typically a price jump at carats, according to the MSN.com article. Buying a .95 carat diamond will save a lot of money, while the fiancée will be able to safely call it a one carat diamond.

But what cut of diamond does she want? What setting? This is when detective skills and a good jeweler come into play.

"We'll ask if she likes flashy or simple things, what the jewelry she already wears is like and work with that," said Alma Mahkewa, sales associate at Zales Jewelers. "We ask if she's simple and likes petite things or if she likes things people can see clear across the room."

According to the MSN.com article, 90 percent of men choose round-cut diamonds. For those who want to step out of the box, other popular cuts are princess, emerald and cushion.

Solitaire settings mean the diamond is on a band by itself. Three-diamond settings also are popular.

"Sometimes in a three-stone setting, we'll put emeralds or sapphires on the side for a one-of-a-kind look," Mahkewa said. Vintage and antique settings, as well as yellow gold, are popular again, Elliott said.

But when it comes to what that one special someone wants, do not just follow the trends.

"Pay attention when she's window shopping to what she stops and looks at," Elliott said. "Make a point to go out to dinner at a place you'll have to walk by a jewelry store."

When women think engagement time is approaching, they often will start looking — not so secretly — at rings in front of their boyfriends. This is a good time to pay attention.

"If they can catch their girlfriends looking through magazines and see what they like, we can get an idea," said Mahkewa.

Flashy reality TV-style proposals not right for some couples

By Emily Sterk
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

When it comes to wedding reality TV shows, the proposals portrayed are extravagant.

Kendra Risen, freshman in genealogy, said reality TV shows and the proposals they think up are fake, forced and staged.

"(Proposals) are a fairy tale," she said. "People like to see other people happy because their life might not be too great."

Stu and Heidi Heckman were married July 27. Heidi said the way Stu proposed was romantic and intimate, and just right for them — not too flashy, but subtle.

Heidi, a sophomore in elementary education, said the night they became engaged began with dinner on the Plaza in Kansas City, Mo.

That is when Heidi said she got her hopes up that Stu was going to propose.

Reality TV shows, like "The Bachelor" put these images and thoughts in woman's heads that can set guys up for failure, Heidi said.

"Some girls like extravagant," Heidi said, "but it would be weird to do something big and expensive if it's not their personality."

She said after dinner they went to Stu's grandparents' lake house to spend time with their families.

"I was the only one who did not know about the proposal, but everyone else knew," Heidi said.

Stu, a junior in personal finance planning, said he wanted this type of proposal because it was fitting for them.

"We went down near the lake and just hung out, and then I asked her to marry me," Stu said.

He said reality shows are the wrong way to represent a relationship because the relationships form so quickly. He called the shows a competition on up to the proposal, instead of an actual love story.

"It makes the guy look bad because he is dating all the women at once," Risen said. "If he wants to date one person, then he should date one person, and not go on reality TV."

Ron Frank, communications professor, said reality TV is a fantasy, which makes them so popular. He said it is easier for people to sit down, watch and hope the same might happen in their lives.

"Big proposals do happen," Frank said.

He said reality TV shows concerning and proposals are interesting to the viewer. There is always a climax and a hook, — these aspects boost ratings.

Frank said producers care more about ratings than the people on the show. He said they must have counselors on set to prevent lawsuits.

Stu said reality TV shows are the wrong way to represent a relationship because the relationships form so fast. He said it is a competition instead of a love story.

"It doesn't have to be a big show — it depends on the couple," he said. "(Reality TV) gives girls the thought of how romance is supposed to be, but lets them down in the end."

Web site offers info to newlyweds, 'nearlyweds' about '08 candidates

By Sarah Burford
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Knot, The Nest and the Wedding Channel have combined efforts to create a Web site designed to encourage their 12 million "newlywed and nearlywed" female users to educate themselves on the 2008 presidential campaign.

According to BridesDecide.com, creators assumed responsibility for providing basic election coverage to the potential voters and for promoting political discussion.

BridesDecide.com provides users with profiles of each presidential candidate. The profiles include descriptions of the candidates' political accomplishments and offices held, their stances on "hot issues," quirky histories in the "Did You Know?" sections and the candidates' current activities.

The site allows users to compare up to three candidates' profiles at one time. In addition, the site's creators added a bit of their own spice by including candidates' wedding pictures and stories of how candidates met their mate, got engaged and tied the knot.

The site said it is still in the process of collecting all the candidates' stories.

George Weston, president of College Republicans and graduate student in sociology, said he would like to see more wedding and life stories on the site, as well as information on how certain policies affect young married couples.

"I've seen comparisons on women's rights when it comes to jobs," Weston said.

"It's pretty interesting. I think that would be important to young women."

He said young women are still less likely to vote than other demographics, and it is a good idea to get them more involved.

"Their lives are about to change dramatically," Weston said, referring to newly-engaged women. "So they should know what the future holds for them when it comes to politics."

Kilty Maher, field representative for Sen. Sam Brownback's presidential campaign, said the site brings the election to the people and is reaching out to a group of potential voters who do not realize they can be involved.

"Politics is a field that everyone is involved in, whether they like it or not," Maher said.

She said the site benefits Brownback, R-Kan., and other candidates by getting them name recognition and by placing all candidates on the same level.

This is especially important for second-tier candidates, who do not get as much publicity as the big-name candidates, Maher said.

In addition to viewing candidates' profiles, site users can register to vote, find their respective polling locations, explore the "Election Day Q&A" and join political discussions through the wedding Web sites.

Users must register with one of the wedding sites in order to engage in the discussions.

BridesDecide.com offers a survey asking users' opinions on important issues.

A schedule of the televised political debates also is available on the Web site.

While the creators said their site is targeting engaged and newly-married women, engaged couple Bailey Raaf, junior in family life and community service, and Brady Hedstrom, junior in civil engineering, think otherwise. Hedstrom and Raaf believe the site can serve more than just this demographic.

"I don't know why it's connected to brides," Raaf said. "I think it's a ploy to get them to look at the candidates' weddings and think, 'Oh, that's a cute story.'"

Erinn Rock, member of Young Democrats and senior in wildlife biology and English literature, said she thought the wedding stories made the candidates seem more personable.

"But personally, it wouldn't influence who I would vote for," Rock said.

Hedstrom and Raaf said they thought the information about the candidates was helpful, and they especially liked the profile-comparison feature.

"It's really important to compare different candidates' views side by side," Hedstrom said. "And to have one source to assimilate all that information."

Raaf said she liked that the site avoided using political jargon, and was instead straightforward and concise.

"I didn't even know there was something like that out there," Hedstrom said. "I may go back and look more closely at some of the stuff."

MY STORY

Nerves do not prevent 'perfect' proposal

My Story features an engagement story from any student. If you would like to share your story, please e-mail Salena Strate at news@spub.ksu.edu.

"I have absolutely no idea, what I am doing," I shouted to myself in the car a couple of hours before I asked the most significant and loaded question I would ever ask in my life.

I was voted the "most unlikely person to get married" by my friends just three years earlier.

Yet here I was with a ring in my pocket, a question running in my head and a heart-beat like that of a junior high girl's on the night of her first date.

I got out of class an hour early that day. Rebekah Buescher and I were taking summer classes at Johnson County Community College and all I could do was wait.

"I'm so nervous that I'm starting to sweat," I wrote in my journal while I was waiting.

"This ring - it has to be fake, right?" I wrote.

The only thing I knew was that Rebekah was the most beautiful and fascinating girl I had ever met.

She had captured my attention for two and a half years. I wanted to make those years last forever.

"Hey man, if I ignore you when you get out of class, forgive me," I text messaged to my friend who was in class with Rebekah.

"I'm going to pop the question tonight."

When Rebekah got out of class, I told her I wanted to take her somewhere. When we got to the huge hill that dominates the middle part of the campus, I took her hand.

Steven Doll | COLLEGIAN

"Let's take off our shoes and go barefoot," I said, pointing to the top of the hill.

She had told me she wanted to be barefoot when she got engaged.

We climbed to the top of the enormous hill. It was a whole world in itself. The trees were gently swaying in the wind, a rabbit chewed on some grass, and the sun was setting behind a scattered painting of clouds.

"This is so perfect," she told me as she leaned against my shoulder, not suspecting a thing.

I have never been more nervous in my entire life.

After I made my incredibly charming and stuttered speech, I bent down on one knee and asked Rebekah to marry me.

After the most hilarious variations of surprise, joy and tears I have ever seen on anyone's face, she said yes and hugged me until I thought I was going to die.

I placed the ring on her finger, took her by the waist and spun her around on the top of the hill.

"I'm getting married," Rebekah shouted to a girl passing on the sidewalk below. She looked up and smiled.

Now I was going to be spending the rest of my life with my best friend.

We plan on getting married May 30, 2008, at Hillcrest Covenant Church in Overland Park, Kan. Then we plan to finish school at K-State and move back to Kansas City, Kan.

Mark Wampler is a junior in print journalism, and Rebekah Buescher is a junior in elementary education.

Love your locks

EXTRA SHORT, LIKE DAVID BECKHAM

SHORT, LIKE KEVIN SPACEY

MIDWAY, LIKE BRAD PITT

Men should not be afraid to try new, celebrity-inspired hairstyles

While women constantly change their hair color, length and style, men typically have stayed conservative when it comes to their locks. But guys should not be scared to change it up every once in a while; it keeps things interesting.

Take David Beckham, the all-star soccer player and male fashion icon, for example.

He has had more hair styles and lengths than any male I've ever seen, and is praised at every change for his bold and unique style choices.

So go ahead, slap on a little gel, or take off or gain a few inches every once in a while. You've got nothing to lose but length.

EXTRA SHORT

This style can range from a bald head to a nice, all-around buzz cut. These styles are the easiest to maintain and have been surprisingly popular around Hollywood. After all, it is Beckham's newest look.

ELISE PODHAJSKY

Though there isn't too much you can do to actually style the hair, you can always add a little flair with a well-tailored hat like a fedora or a flat-topped boater.

SHORT

This look usually refers to 1/4 inch to an inch in length. Besides being equally as easy to maintain as a buzz, this style works great for men with receding hairlines or hair loss.

By keeping it short all over, hair loss becomes a lot less noticeable.

Kevin Spacey is a great example of this. He makes a receding hairline look good.

You can also add texture to this look by rubbing a dime-sized amount of gel or a dab of pomade — a waxy styling product — into your palms and lightly tousling the hair from the forehead to the crown.

This creates a simple, yet sophisticated look.

MIDWAY

For hair about 1 to 2 inches in length, there are endless possibilities for styles and cuts, yet the three most popular styles for midway hair are the faux hawk, the tamed afro and the I-just-rolled-out-of-bed look.

The faux hawk calls for the longer hair on top and shorter hair on the sides, similar to a crew cut with more length. Hair is pushed toward the center of the head and usually cemented with gel. Orlando Bloom and Colin Farrell have been known to sport this fresh look.

For coarse hair, a tamed afro is a great option if the full '70s style isn't for you. This tamed 'fro is well-trimmed and only about an inch off the head. This look is also very professional and has been worn well by Andre "3000" Benjamin and Don Cheadle.

Quite possibly the most popular hairstyle for men has been the messy I-just-rolled-out-of-bed-yet-my-hair-is-surprisingly-perfect look. It works best with a mid-length cut and can be achieved by rubbing mousse or pomade into wet or dry hair. Use your fingers to tousle the hair and smooth loose pieces around the face-frazzled yet flawless. Numerous stars like Edward Norton, Tom Cruise and Brad Pitt have sported this style.

LONG

Long hair for men is categorized as being anywhere from 2 to 4 inches and has potential to be either super sexy or super sleazy.

To stay away from the latter, make sure you are washing your hair on a regular basis. I cannot stress this enough, guys. If you have longer hair, please lather, rinse and repeat at least twice a week. If that is asking too much, I suggest trying out the extra-short cuts.

But if shampoo is not an issue for you, and your locks are long, let it go natural.

If your hair is curly, pick up some gel, mousse or pomade — whichever works best with your hair's thickness — and lightly coat from root to tip.

This will keep the frizz to a minimum. However, be careful not to add too much product because your hair might become crunchy and permanently wet-looking.

For wavy to straight hair, let it dry naturally or use a small amount of pomade to keep pieces out of your eyes.

This look has been notoriously hot for celebs like Antonio Banderas and Johnny Depp.

One thing to try and stay away from with this length is the flipped-out or matted hat-hair look. This is almost always unfortunately achieved after wearing a cap or beanie when hair is wet. The result is a helmet shape, which is slightly odd and never attractive. Just say no.

EXTRA LONG

For hair longer than 4 inches — experiment. There are endless ways to style extra-long hair without looking too "feminine," by taking tips from female styles.

I've even seen a guy make pigtails look good. But since men generally like to stick to the basics, some fun yet bold options are layering, cornrows or braiding and dreadlocks. It's easy to find a salon to get any of these styles.

Just make sure you call around first — or ask a hippie.

'Ratatouille' called 'best film of the year,' 'perfect in every way'

"Ratatouille"

Movie review by Brendan Praeger

In a time when computer-animated movies are a dime a dozen, Pixar's "Ratatouille" faced an uphill battle from the beginning.

First of all, the film's title isn't the most accessible. While standing in line for tickets this summer, I heard the majority of parents mispronounce the title. In some cases their children even corrected them.

The film also faced the unfair challenge of being compared to Pixar's impressive library. Previous films include "Toy Story," "A Bug's Life," "Finding Nemo" and "The Incredibles."

"Ratatouille" stood in great company, and even if it became the worst Pixar movie, that wouldn't necessarily be an insult.

I wasn't excited to watch a film about a rat who wanted to cook.

I used to love computer-animated movies, but in the past few years they have plagued theaters with poor celebrity voice-overs and lame stories. Even "Shrek," one of the few franchises with enough originality to spawn a decent sequel, has become stale.

I dragged my low expectations into the afternoon show filled with toddlers and tired parents. I sat through some of the worst previews I have ever seen. (Why would anyone make a movie based on the "Bratz" toys?) Finally, after bleeding my excitement dry, I saw the best film of the year.

Calling "Ratatouille" the best film of the year might seem a little premature, but it is honestly perfect in almost every way.

I rarely see a film I can't complain about. I'm a film snob — it's a gift and a curse. Even the best films have their shortcomings, but I can't think of a single way "Ratatouille" could have been better.

Being a Pixar film, it comes as no surprise that the animation is incredible. The cinematography uses the animated medium to the fullest extent. Chase scenes and point-of-view shots wouldn't be the same in live action, but they are finely crafted here, adding suspense and an interesting perspective to potentially lackluster scenes.

The story is a hit as well. The main character, Remy, is a rat with a heightened sense of taste and smell. He hates eating garbage with his family, so instead, he watches his favorite television cook, Gusteau, and learns from his book, "Anyone Can Cook."

After being separated from his family, he ends up at the failing restaurant of the late Gusteau. After Remy makes a delicious soup, the newest garbage boy, Linguini, gets credit for his culinary skills. Remy and Linguini team up to bring the restaurant back into the limelight.

The story never becomes too complex, but it doesn't fall into the boring trap of predictability. Writer and director Brad Bird ("The Incredibles," "The Iron Giant") crafts a thoroughly entertaining story by avoiding the cheap gags and juvenile humor that populates most animated films. Instead, he uses well-written dialogue and genuine storytelling to pull laughs — and tears — from the audience.

The voice acting also comes out on top of other films in this genre. Rather than using celebrities simply to put their name on the poster, each actor fits their part perfectly.

Patton Oswalt gives Remy the perfect mix of skepticism and charm, and Peter O'Toole gives the jaded food critic a menacing bite that will send shivers down your spine.

Labeling "Ratatouille" Pixar's best film is no small gesture. Their films are among my favorites. But this film is easily deserving of such a title.

"Ratatouille" deserves every ounce of praise it receives. It is a film that is perfect in every way. Even "Lifted," the short film preceding the movie, is better than almost anything else I've seen this year.

Don't steer clear of this film because it looks childish. If you missed it this summer, catch it this weekend in the K-State Student Union.

AWARENESS | Real-life experiences motivate women to get involved

Services employee, said she has close ties to breast cancer. Clay County Community Health Services works to provide educational materials as well as funding for screening of men and women, she said.

"We've actually, through funding, helped detect breast cancer in two women in their 40s," Winter said. "Of the women we screened, one was a coworker, and one was a classmate of mine. I was kind of in shock. You don't expect women your own age and in their 40s to have breast cancer. It kind of brought to my attention that breast cancer can happen at any age."

Though raising funds is an important part of battling breast cancer, Carter said she thinks educating women is just as – if not more – important.

"It gives me great encouragement for the next generation, and it also tells me we have a new generation of women who are looking out for their health," Carter said. "Hopefully during their lifetime we'll have a cure."

Rally Point and will last until midnight. Activities will continue at noon Saturday and last until 2 a.m. Sunday.

Leaman said the event will offer beverages – including German beer – German food, live bands, carnival rides, a Volksmarch and a singing competition.

The Volksmarch will begin at noon Saturday and will consist of a walk to Moon Lake and back. The first 250 participants to complete the 5-mile march will receive a commemorative Oktoberfest medallion. Participants must pay a $3 fee to compete.

One part of the entertainment is Operation Rising Star, a singing competition, that starts at 6 p.m. Friday. The finals will begin at 6 p.m. Saturday.

Leaman said Oktoberfest is open to the public, except for the Operation Rising Star competition, which is only open to active duty military and national reserve. However, the public is encouraged to participate in choosing the winner for the contest.

Once completed, Piper said the committee will present a new strategy to the Student Senate, Faculty Senate and administrative officials.

The senate will vote on the creation of the committee during next week's SGA meeting, as well as the appointment of the committee members.

Also, during the meeting, the senate approved the creation of a special committee to implement a K-State student senate-sponsored community service project and appointed its members. The chair of the committee is Alyssa Provencio and the members are Kelsie Ball, Andrew Hushka, Kyle Merklein, Ashley Phelon and Kyle Spencer.

"The committee is going to be looking at three to four major projects from many different entities of Manhattan," Piper said.

He said the members will then present the different projects to the senate for approval.

The senate also approved Kristel Williams, Tonisha Luster, Dan Perkins, Cameron Ward and Anna Zeiger to serve on the Diversity programming committee.

The senate passed a bill to allocate funds to two campus organizations – the Navigators and the Apostolic Christian Church Youth Group.

students could use.

"It's a really efficient use of space, and there was a lot of interesting stuff like the swiveling mirror," he said.

All the electronic equipment is sold on JVC's Web site while the furniture came from companies chosen by Popular Science.

K-State is the only Big 12 university the tour will stop at. Smith said Popular Science wanted to choose universities with different student populations all over the country.

Smith and a few other Popular Science representatives on the tour were hired directly out of college to go on the tour.

"That was the neat thing," said Smith, spring graduate of University of Tennessee, "We get to travel all over the country, from North Carolina to San Diego."

John Hinerman, JVC senior product specialist, said JVC sponsored the tour to learn what electronic equipment college students want.

"It's a way of exposure and getting information on the pulse of today's young people," Hinerman said.

Though most students cannot afford the equipment, in the dorm-room display, Hinerman said students and JVC can learn from the tour.

"It's not reasonably affordable for most college students," he said. "Taking this much effort, it has to be worthwhile, so we are more interested on the input of students."

joining groups led by KHS members.

Oldham said the groups go out into the field until about noon, and then they meet back to show off what they have found.

"We have experts there to verify and document what we find," Oldham said. "We release almost everything we catch back into the area where it was found. We only keep species that are needed for scientific study to benefit the species in the long run."

Among the animals sought are rare and threatened species like the Timber Rattlesnake and the Eastern Newt.

"Some of the species we are looking for haven't been seen since the 1920s," Oldham said. "We chose this location because they were seen there before, and we're hoping they'll show up again. Or if they don't show up, we can start to figure out why."

"The findings also help to track how a species is moving through the state and whether the population is expanding or decreasing."

The society has two annual field trips per year, one in the fall and one in the spring, Oldham said.

"We chose fall and spring because the animals are more active," she said.

"In the spring they are coming out of hibernation, and in the fall they are getting ready to hibernate, so we have the best chance of seeing rare species during these times."

KANSAS vs. K-STATE

The 105th edition of the Sunflower Showdown is the most anticipated since 1995, when the No. 14 Wildcats defeated the No. 6 Jayhawks 41-7. Twelve years later, the stakes are high once again. Kansas is trying to crack the Top 25, while No. 24 K-State is trying to solidify its status as the frontrunner in the Big 12 North.

OFF THE FIELD | CORNERBACK RAY CHEATHAM

Just because Ray Cheatham is the son of a preacher doesn't mean he's never gotten himself into any kind of trouble. He'll readily admit he's had his share of slip-ups, though he contends he now knows the difference between right and wrong. As this week's Off-the-Field guest, Cheatham took the time to answer a variety of questions, everything from his take on the now-famous Ron Prince stomp to the trash-talking ways of the K-State secondary.

What did you think of the Ron Prince stomp?

I didn't see it until they replayed it or whatever, but I've never seen him do anything like that. I can tell he was really excited over it.

Based on that, you think he's got some pretty good dance moves?

From that, I think he might. I think he might.

Between Mike Gundy's screaming and Ron Prince's stomping, who had the better performance?

I don't really know much about the Mike Gundy thing, but I just know coach Prince was excited or whatever, and we were just having fun with it.

Who has the better mascot, KU or K-State?

I just like the Wildcat. I was a Wildcat in high school, so I was born with it. The Wildcat is something that's always been brought up in me.

Your dad is a reverend, so did you ever get in any trouble?

They always say that preacher's kids are the worst kids, but yeah, I had my share of trouble.

Was he strict with you?

No, he wasn't as strict as most people thought he was, but he put his foot down and let me know right from wrong. The worst was probably when I came home and I had a couple of bad grades on my report card. He kind of whooped me on my back side.

Are we talking B's and C's, or D's and F's?

I had some D's. I didn't have any F's ... but they don't go over well in our house.

Justin Roland had some comments about Texas' vulnerability a few weeks ago, and we just saw Justin McKinney recently say KU is not as fast and not as tough as you guys. Do your teammates ever learn?

Yeah, they will. Eventually they will. But that's how it goes. Some people are just like that.

Does coach Prince like it when you guys put yourself out there like that?

No, not at all.

Anybody sleep through the media training sessions?

Nah, I don't look back to see. I'm up in the front so I make sure I'm paying attention.

Who's the biggest trash talker in the secondary?

I mean, we all talk trash. But I figure it's probably BG (Byron Garvin). He's got a swagger. He has the ability to have a swagger like that.

Are you known to trash talk with the wide receivers?

You know, I have a little fun. But it's nothing major. I just show with my game.

The locker room can't be the cleanest of places. Who's got the worst hygiene?

Ah, I don't know. It's just so nasty. You come in sweating, and you can't tell where it's coming from. The whole locker room is like that.

What is the easiest class you've taken at K-State?

Intro to Leadership. Basically you just come and be active and talk and try to improve yourself in leadership or whatever.

Being from Arkansas, were you exposed to a bit too much football?

No, not at all. I just wanted to do something different. I had seen it all my life. I looked at the Big 12 when I came to juco, and I just knew it was something I wanted to do.

OFFENSE

Andy Nelson will have his toughest matchup this season when he takes on Kansas cornerback Agib Talib, possibly the best defensive back in the Big 12. Talib has two interceptions this year, returning one for a touchdown. If the Jayhawks take away the short passes to Nelson, K-State will have to look for other options, like big play receiver Deon Murphy or steady running back James Johnson.

Quarterback Todd Reesing has 144 rushing yards. His mobility might come in handy against a K-State defense that has 15 sacks. He could turn around and hand the ball off to a pair of running backs with more than 300 yards each, but that might not be the best plan for success. The Wildcats allow only 79.2 rushing yards per game, so Kansas could opt to find a weakness in the secondary.

DEFENSE

Led by Big 12 Defensive Player of the Week Ian Campbell, K-State's defense has been knocking around quarterbacks all season long. K-State can use its quickness to put pressure on Reesing, who has been remarkably accurate. The Wildcats will need to protect against the big-play capabilities of wide receivers Marcus Henry and Agib Talib, who have combined for five touchdowns and can spread the defense with their speed.

The Jayhawks are No. 1 in the nation in scoring defense, giving up 5.8 points per game. However, they haven't faced a top-60 offense, which might make the statistics a bit unreliable. The Jayhawks have five interceptions and have allowed only two TDs. Expect James Johnson and Leon Patton to get some extra carries, as the Wildcats try to avoid a dangerous secondary by pounding away at an untested front seven.

SPECIAL TEAMS

With two touchdowns last week, the Wildcats proved once again they have one of the most dangerous special teams units in the nation. Overshadowed was the resiliency displayed by kicker Brooks Rossmann. After missing a field goal for the first time this season (from 51 yards), he came back and made a critical 44-yarder. Punter Tim Reyer will continue to give the Wildcats good field position. The Ray Guy award candidate is averaging 45.1 yards per punt.

Kickoff returner Marcus Herford is leading the Big 12 with 33 yards per return. Herford can change the game with his big-play ability (he has one TD). Kicker Scott Webb has yet to kick a field goal from beyond 40 yards, so that might present coach Mark Mangino with a tough decision if Kansas is caught in that range. Do you risk the field position by taking a low-percentage stab at three points, or do you try to punt close to the goal line?

PREDICTION

Coming off a big win against Texas, K-State should continue its winning streak against a Kansas team that has yet to face any competitive teams this season. K-State's defensive quickness will stun a Jayhawk offense that is averaging 53.5 points per game.

Big 12 North coaches say it's too early for conference predictions

By Joel Jellison
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

As he approached the podium for Monday's press conference, K-State coach Ron Prince was asked a question that every Big 12 North coach has been forced to answer over the past few days.

Is the overwhelming strength of the Big 12 Conference now in the North?

"I have no idea," Prince smiled. "Wish I knew enough about what was going on around the league to tell you."

Prince's feelings seem to be a reflection of what everyone around Big 12 country is thinking. After Colorado and K-State turned the conference upside down by knocking off Oklahoma and Texas, it caused — more than anything — confusion.

The wins didn't just affect the polls, they created questions within the Big 12 about the true power of the South. For years the South teams, led by national powers Texas and Oklahoma, have thoroughly dominated their North counterparts.

But after the results from the first full week of conference play, could it be possible that the power is shifting from the almighty South to the "door-mat" North?

"This is a tough league, so nothing surprises me," Missouri coach Gary Pinkel said. "Obviously, there were a couple big wins in our league."

Even after the two upsets, some coaches thought it was a bit premature to crown the North superior.

"I don't know — I think it might be a little too early to tell yet," Baylor coach Guy Morriss said. "We got a lot of games to play."

The South division has

A CONFERENCE DIVIDED

Big 12 Conference divisional records since 2003, including championship games:

2007

2006
14-5 South
2005
12-7 South
2004

2003
12-6 South

won four of the last five and seven Big 12 Championships since the conference was created in 1996. The last North championship was K-State's 35-7 victory over Oklahoma in 2003.

The last North team to go to the BCS National Championship Game was Nebraska in 2001, when the Huskers were thumped by Miami. Oklahoma and Texas have accounted for four trips, each winning once.

The past, however, is the past. Sports trends usually move in cycles. In the mid to late 1990s, the North was the power, and the recent developments could be signs of change.

Texas has struggled at times this season, and the problems didn't subside in the game against K-State.

Meanwhile, Oklahoma had its worst performance of the season against a Colorado team that went 2-10 in 2006.

The North has three ranked teams — Missouri, K-State and Nebraska. Both Colorado and Kansas are receiving votes. The South has two ranked teams, and only one is receiving votes.

"The last couple of days, everybody's talking about the North," said Kansas coach

Christopher Hanewinkel | COLLEGIAN
K-State's Jordy Nelson eludes a tackle Saturday at Texas. The Wildcats' win over the Longhorns was one of many upsets last weekend.

Mark Mangino, whose team is 4-0 but has yet to play a conference game. "I'm going to take a wait-and-see attitude and see how it plays out. Everybody in the Big 12 is capable of winning on any given day against anybody."

It might not be that one division is ready to overtake the other. For the first time in its history, maybe the Big 12 will see a balance among the 12 teams as Oklahoma and Texas begin to even out with the rest.

Iowa State coach Gene Chizik, who was defensive coordinator at Texas before this season, said he has seen the North making progress.

"I don't know how everybody perceives either side of the division, but I do know that this side has drastically improved

COLORADO MEDIA RELATIONS
Colorado's Jordan Dizon sacks Oklahoma QB Sam Bradford during the Buffaloes' shocking victory to open Big 12 Conference play.

over the last two years," Chizik said. "There's been a great, great improvement."

The situation in the South differs from what it's been in previous years. It's wide open. Either Texas or Oklahoma will be 0-2 after this week, and the opportunity is there for a new team to win the division.

Texas A&M is the only other team that has ever represented the South in the championship.

But before any conclusions are drawn, the games have to be played.

"My comment has been the past couple weeks is 'let it play out,'" Pinkel said. "There's a lot of great coaches and great football teams in both divisions. Just let it play out, and we'll see how it unfolds."

Undefeated, unranked Kansas team feels ready to play in Manhattan

By Jonathan Potter
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Their fans are pumped. They are 4-0 and off to their best start since 1995. They rank third in the nation in both total offense and defense, scoring 28 touchdowns and allowing just three.

Does a specific team come to mind? Perhaps it could be Ohio State, Wisconsin or LSU? All wrong.

Those stats describe Kansas. The Jayhawks rank near the top of the nation in virtually every statistical category. But why aren't they getting more attention? Why hasn't Kansas been plastered all over ESPN?

Though the statistics are in the Jayhawks' favor, the Associated Press has not given them the satisfaction of a Top-25 ranking. Kansas and Connecticut (5-0) are the only two undefeated teams not in the Top 25.

The reason, more or less, is scheduling. CBS Sports rated Kansas' strength of schedule 116th out of 120 teams.

It seems everyone — including the AP — is taking the Jayhawks' success so far with a grain of salt due to the lack of quality competition.

But at least one person has not overlooked the Jayhawks. K-State coach Ron Prince said he knows Kansas is very disciplined and well coached. And Prince, whose Wildcats already have faced Auburn and Texas on the road, said this would be the toughest test for his team so far this season.

"We'll have to play our very best," Prince said. "We'll have to play very aggressively to have this outcome be the way we want it to be."

Prince is talking about a team averaging 53.5 points and 552.8 yards per game.

The majority of the Jayhawks' offense has come from one player — quarterback Todd Reesing. He has thrown for 1,199 yards and 11 touchdowns but admitted the Jayhawks' competition has been less than impressive.

"I think a lot of people are ready to see how good we really are," Reesing said at the team's weekly press conference. "They want us to go out there and prove ourselves. We are ready to go out and prove that we have a good team and that we can compete with the best teams there are."

Of Reesing's 11 touchdown passes, three have gone to cornerback Aqib Talib. That's right — a cornerback has three receiving scores. Talib plays both sides of the ball and is leading the Jayhawks in touchdown receptions.

Talib also has been the Jayhawks' main defensive weapon, returning an interception 100 yards for a touchdown against Florida International. He has recorded one other interception and 18 tackles.

Reesing said he watched K-State beat Texas on Saturday and saw the pressure the Wildcats' defense put on Texas quarterback Colt McCoy.

"I'm confident that our offensive line can protect me back there, and I think we'll be all right," Reesing said.

So far, Reesing and Talib have had the luxury of playing at home. The Jayhawks haven't played on the road since a 42-17 loss at Missouri to end last season.

On Saturday, a sellout crowd of more than 50,000 K-State fans will remind Kansas what a road game is like.

Kansas coach Mark Mangino said he thinks his team is prepared to win at Snyder Fam-

Campus, county police departments to watch for ordinance violations involving ticket resales

By Adrienne DeWeese
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Two ordinances that involve solicitation will be strictly enforced at K-State's game against Kansas on Saturday, a Riley County Police Department official said.

RCPD Sgt. Doug Wood said ticket scalping and solicitations were issues discussed at a weekly football planning meeting Wednesday. K-State Police and RCPD will enforce two specific ordinances that scalping violates, Wood said.

One ordinance is solicitation without a permit in the city of Manhattan. The second ordinance that will be enforced is ticket soliciting in the street while blocking traffic, which is in violation of a state ordinance, Wood said.

If local residents are caught scalping tickets in violation of an ordinance, they will be issued a citation and their cash and tickets will be seized as case evidence, Wood said. They also will receive a notice to appear in court.

If those who violate an ordinance do not have local ties, they will be arrested and must post a $750 bond to be released, he said.

Scalping is the purchase of tickets at retail price and reselling them at higher prices because of the demand for them, Wood said. Facebook.com's Marketplace application had general-admission ticket prices at $200 as of Thursday morning.

There are more than 10 states that still charge ticket scalpers with a misdemeanor or if they are caught selling tickets for more than box-office price. Kansas is not one of these states.

University policy prohibits solicitations of any unauthorized item for sale, trade or giveaway on stadium grounds, according to www.kstatesports.com. The policy includes solicitation of charitable donations and game or event tickets.

Violators of the policy will be asked to leave the stadium grounds and might be cited for trespassing, according to the Web site.

K-State athletic officials announced Sept. 18 that the 105th edition of the Sunflower Showdown was sold out. Snyder Family Stadium has an official seating capacity of 50,000. The largest seating capacity in the Sunflower Showdown took place on Oct. 9, 1999, with an attendance of 52,254 — the fourth largest crowd in the stadium's history.

Wood said it is difficult to gauge if ticket scalping is a bigger issue this year than in years past.

"I think it's more of a problem when K-State is doing well and people really want to go to the games," he said. "The bigger the opponent, the bigger the drive is to get tickets to the game."

Some students used networking Web sites like Facebook to search for available tickets. Julie Marino, senior in fashion design, said she created a Facebook event to purchase four tickets for her family.

While her mother found three tickets online through a different Web site, Marino said she did not have much success in finding an additional game ticket through Facebook.

"A lot of people told me 'Good luck,' but I thought I might as well give it a shot," Marino said. "It's been pretty hard. I haven't had much luck with anybody."

Marino said she thinks this year is no different from years past with the demand for tickets to the K-State vs. Kansas game.

"I think it's like this every year," she said. "It's always just chaos when KU comes to town. I think it's been like this every year since I was a freshman."

BAYLOR (3-2, 0-1)

One positive: The Bears have two players, Justin Akers and Brad Taylor, with more than 200 yards receiving.

One negative: Baylor ranks 11th in the Big 12 in red-zone offense, converting only 13 of 17 opportunities.

Coach Guy Morris, on his players' drops in the loss to Texas A&M: "We've not had a real rash of them. It hasn't been too bad. We just didn't catch 'em. It just makes you scratch your head a little bit."

"It is a game. We're not curing cancer out there. We try to have some fun with it."

— COACH RON PRINCE, ON HIS NOW-FAMOUS CELEBRATION AGAINST TEXAS

Prince inspires team, fans with energy

By Wendy Haun
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

To some, it might have looked like a Native American war dance.

To others, it was just hilarious.

It's been dubbed the "Ron Prince Stomp," and the video of Prince's celebration after James Johnson's kickoff return for a touchdown against Texas is slowly making its way through the college football world. It was replayed on ESPN over the weekend, and now it has more than 10,000 views on YouTube.

The "Stomp" is showing a different side to Prince.

"There's very few things that get me excited during a game, and kicking and special teams does," Prince said. "We work these kids so hard, train them so hard that if you are just a statue out there all the time, I don't think that's much fun."

"It is a game. We're not curing cancer out there. We try to have some fun with it. Everybody was excited. Maybe I should practice."

The unabashed show of emotion came after two key moments in the game — Johnson's 85-yard run-back and Jordy Nelson's 89-yard punt return for a TD that sealed the win.

K-State's players all said they loved seeing Prince's dance attempts, but they just hope that doesn't spread to the other sideline this weekend against Kansas — most notably with Kansas coach Mark Mangino.

"It was pretty hilarious," wide receiver Deon Murphy said. "I'll probably get on him about that all week. We were just talking about it in the meeting. We hope Mangino doesn't do anything like that."

One of a coach's main responsibilities is to motivate and energize his players.

Some might use a well-versed speech or another method, but safety Chris Carney said dancing and giving high-fives on the sideline has the same effect.

"When you have a coach that gets excited with you, it brings energy to the team," Carney said. "That's something that we build off of. When you see coach get excited about big special-teams plays, it wants you to have him get excited for you."

The players gave Prince plenty to be excited about on Saturday.

But his players aren't the only people who are glad to see Prince's emotional sideline displays.

ESPN senior writer Pat Forde also got quite a kick out of the highlight. He said it's nice to see something other than the more conservative football coaching approach, like the one used by Indianapolis Colts' coach Tony Dungy.

"I like seeing a demonstrative coach out there," Forde said. "There are times when the Dungy approach can be beneficial, but I like seeing a coach that is wrapped up in seeing his guys do well. It could be chopped up to youthful enthusiasm. In 10 years, he might not be doing it. But right now, it's refreshing."

Forde said he sees Prince as a good fit for K-State following the Bill Snyder era.

"When you are replacing a coach, usually the mindset is to get someone different from the last guy," he said. "He's definitely different from Bill Snyder. He's young and energetic and demonstrative. Change can be good, and this looks like a good one to me."

The Sporting News' Tom Dienhart compared Prince to some other energetic college football coaches, like Wisconsin's Bret Bielema and Illinois' Ron Zook. Those two also are having successful starts to the season.

Dienhart said Prince was a terrific fit for K-State, and that the emotional displays do not energize only the players.

"It's nice to see a coach that is emotionally invested like that," he said. "I think the team feeds off of it, and his fans feed off of that passion."

Though the Stomp is drawing quite a few laughs out of those who see it, it is showing one quality in Prince as a coach — he cares about his players, and he's not afraid to show that.

Prince said he might need to practice his dance moves before the next game, but there's one player who won't be challenging him to a dance-off anytime soon.

"He can have the dancing," Murphy said. "He can have all that. He might have more rhythm than me."

K-STATE FOOTBALL BRIEFS

PENALTIES DECREASING

After three weeks of undisciplined play, K-State seems to be a bit more focused now that the Big 12 Conference season is underway.

How else can you explain the significant drop in penalties that took place last weekend in the Wildcats' 41-21 victory over Texas?

Through three games, K-State averaged 13.6 penalties and 133 penalty yards against its non-conference opponents.

This was no small feat. Not since the inception of the Big 12 in 1996 had the Wildcats been on such a rugged pace.

The yellow flags were so high, in fact, that K-State led the nation in penalty yards — something that was concerning both coach Ron Prince and his players.

But the bye week prior to the Texas game has seemingly healed the Wildcats' penalty problem.

They were only penalized three times for 23 yards against the Longhorns, and one of them was intentional. Prince purposely took a delay-of-game penalty to give punter Tim Reyer more room to work.

"We stayed away from things like penalties — some of those effort penalties as I would describe them," Prince said. "I was very pleased that we were able to stay away from those things."

K-State will need to keep penalties to a minimum this week against Kansas, a team that — with a record of 4-0 — has enough going for them already.

REYER REIGNING

Punter Tim Reyer has come a long way since he forgot to take the field on a fourth-down play against Oklahoma in 2005.

He's averaging 45.1 yards per punt this season, and his name has surfaced in the race for the Ray Guy award — given to the best punter in college football.

Though he has several goals he still wants to accomplish at K-State, it's hard to ignore the possibility of him punting on Sundays in the NFL.

"Obviously, it would be nice to think like that," he said. "I just really have to stay focused right now and keep improving and not get too far ahead of myself ... I need to get it out of my head right now."

With Kansas improving its play over the last few seasons, and with its defense entering the game ranked third in the nation, Reyer's contributions will be more important than ever.

"They're doing good, we're doing good, so it's going to make it more of an intense game," Reyer said. "In the past, it really wasn't that big of a deal because we'd been beating them 50-0 and big scores like that. Recently, it's been more competitive."

OPINIONS FROM BOTH SIDES

THE UNIVERSITY DAILY KANSAN

Sunflower Showdown will be relevant for 1st time in a decade

First off, I would like to thank K-State and Colorado for turning this week's rival game between K-State and Kansas into the game of the week in the Big 12 Conference. For years now the Red River Rivalry has often been pegged as the biggest game of the season for the Big 12, aside from the championship game. Not this year. Sorry Texas and Oklahoma, one of you will be 0-2 after this week.

BRYAN WHEELER

For the first time in more than a decade, Kansas and K-State look to be competitive in the same season. After painful years of rebuilding and coaching changes, Kansas is off to its first 4-0 start since 1995. K-State is reeling off of possibly its biggest victory since blowing out Oklahoma in the 2003 Big 12 Championship game.

K-State fans' memory of the Wildcats' years as a powerhouse going to BCS games is fairly recent. For Kansas fans however, this is not the case. Unless you are an old timer, you would have to close your eyes and imagine what it was like when Kansas played in the 1969 Orange Bowl against Penn State.

This year's rivalry matchup has implications beyond the state of Kansas. Just two weeks into Big 12 play, the winner of this game will likely be a runaway candidate for winning not only the North, but the Big 12 Championship as well. Oklahoma and Texas are not the teams they have been in previous years, as witnessed last weekend.

If Kansas wins, it will be because the Jayhawks continue their success enjoyed throughout the first four games this season. In every aspect of their game — offense, defense and special teams — the Jayhawks are in the top 10 in the nation.

Quarterback Todd Reesing has 11 touchdowns and just one interception in four games. Kansas' running attack, split between Brandon McAnderson and Jake Sharp, have combined for a total of 634 yards and nine touchdowns, which is just as impressive. Wide receiver Marcus Henry leads the Jayhawks with 393 yards and two touchdowns.

Then, there is junior cornerback Aqib Talib. Talib, reminiscent of Denver Broncos' standout cornerback Champ Bailey, is just as much a threat on offense as he is on defense.

In last year's game against the Wildcats, Talib accounted for one of Josh Freeman's three interceptions. It will be interesting to see the matchup between Jordy Nelson and Talib.

If K-State wins, it will be because the Wildcats have played tough against two very competitive opponents — Auburn and Texas. Though the Wildcats lost to Auburn, they played very close until the game ended, learned from their mistakes and have won three games by huge margins.

It looks as if K-State's defense may be the strongest part of this year's team. In last week's game against Texas, the defensive line had four pass breakups, two sacks and 13 hurries that resulted in Colt McCoy leaving the game with a mild concussion. As of this moment, the Wildcats are second behind Oklahoma's 18 total sacks with 15.

Against the pass, the Wildcats intercepted McCoy four times. If the Wildcats can repeat on their success against the Longhorns, it could be a long day for Reesing.

Both teams' special teams have looked outstanding, too. Kansas' Raimond Pendleton has returned a punt for a touchdown, Marcus Herford has a kick-return touchdown and is averaging a Big 12-leading 33-yards per kickoff return. K-State's James Johnson had an impressive kick return for a touchdown last weekend. Nelson had a nice punt return for a touchdown as well. Then, there is junior Deon Murphy, whose punt return average of 19.1 yards leads the Big 12.

This Saturday's game is a far cry for two teams that once played in the "Toilet Bowl" in 1987. Kansas was 1-7 and Kansas State was 0-8. The game ended in a 17-17 tie for the two worst teams in Division I-A football. This year, the game will be played for much more than that — the best team in the Big 12 right now, to be exact.

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

24-hour news cycle leads to K-State's rise, puts it at risk

Last week, K-State did not receive one vote in the Associated Press Top 25 poll. This week, the Wildcats carry a No. 24 ranking and some reporters had K-State as high as No. 14.

So what gives?

The pro-Wildcat swing was helped along by the overwhelming coverage that dominated TV and the Internet. Everywhere you looked, it was hard not to notice all the publicity K-State was receiving.

When you flipped on ESPN Saturday night, all the talking heads were arguing about how K-State was able to knock off a top-10 opponent. Later on, SportsCenter's top plays featured two clips from the Wildcats 41-21 dismantling of then-No. 7 Texas. Even on the Internet, coach Ron Prince's "dance moves" were stealing the show.

The day-long barrage of K-State taking down one of the nation's elite teams coupled with the complete insanity of the day in general, had to have had an effect on America's sports reporters. It showed when K-State suddenly appeared in several writers' polls Sunday.

Subsequently, the Wildcats only received a few votes in the USA Today Coaches Poll. The reason could have something to do with the fact that the coaches don't have as much time to watch Lou Holtz break down highlights or log onto YouTube. They're too entrenched in their own team to notice up-and-comers like K-State.

Despite the fact that few people would debate writers more than coaches, they're probably actually more qualified to fill out a Top 25 Poll. While coaches are dissecting game film for the next week's opponent, sports reporters are finishing up their game wraps and catching up on what happened during all the other games that day.

It doesn't even make sense for coaches to have a vote. Many of them probably don't really like doing it anyway. They have a team of 85 players to take care of first.

Tom Keegan, sports columnist for the Lawrence Journal-World and vote holder in the AP's Top 25 poll, takes his time to fill out his poll every Saturday night or Sunday morning. He said he visits ESPN.com to see how each team in his Top 25 fared that week.

Though the writers have a much better feel for what happened that weekend, it's still not a perfect system. Keegan said there were a few peculiarities in this week's poll.

"How Texas can be ranked ahead of K-State is beyond me," Keegan said in an e-mail interview. "A 20-point victory on the road and the home team is ranked ahead of the team that came to town and spanked it? Can't figure that one out. I voted K-State 19 and dropped Texas from my Top 25."

However, the discrepancy was even greater in the USA Today poll. The coaches have Texas ranked No. 16 while K-State is only receiving votes.

One thing K-State should have learned from last week is that perceptions can change in an instant. The Wildcats' sudden rise could be reversed this weekend.

They face an undefeated Kansas team that's trying to crack the polls and make a statement. Despite their 4-0 record, the Jayhawks have played a non-conference schedule that would make Bill Snyder blush. So knocking off a ranked K-State team would be very impressive.

"I can pretty much guarantee this about the ballot I fill out after this weekend's games: The winner of the K-State-KU game will be in my Top 25, probably somewhere close to No. 19, and the loser won't be," Keegan said.

Aggressive K-State defense piles up hits on opposing quarterbacks

By Ryne Witt
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

There was a time when K-State's defense ranked at or near the top of the national statistics every year.

In fact, it wasn't even that long ago.

In 2000, the K-State defense ranked fourth nationally in total defense. After that, the Wildcats were third in 2001, second in 2002 and sixth in 2003.

During that period of time the defense coined itself a nickname: the "Lynch Mob." And after K-State's dominating defensive performance against Texas last Saturday, linebacker Ian Campbell said he thought the "Lynch Mob" was finally back.

No longer are the players passive, reacting to what the opponent does. Now they're attacking, dictating their own style of play.

"Aggressive" is the first word that comes out of any of our coaches' mouths," cornerback Justin McKinney said. "That's what we're about. That's what we're going to do."

Through four games, the Wildcats seem to be returning to their dominating ways.

K-State is ranked 13th in total defense at 276.25 yards per game and held the Texas offense to just 330 yards. Colt McCoy had four interceptions in what turned out to be a state-moment game for the defense.

"Animals," safety Gary Chandler said of the mentality on defense. "We are just trying to play dirty and get after anybody and everybody with the ball. We expect to hit (the quarterback) a lot and hit him as much as we can legally."

With 15 sacks — eighth nationally — K-State has been punishing opposing quarterbacks.

That makes Ron Prince's motto — there's no problem a good pass rush can't cure — even more true.

Chandler said the QB pressure is making his job easier, because the secondary only has to cover for three or four seconds.

The defensive line's motor, he said, has been handy for more than just pressuring the quarterback.

The Wildcats rank 11th in the nation in rush defense, an improvement from 78th in 2006.

They are only giving up 79 yards a game on the ground and held Jamaal Charles to 72 yards last week at Texas.

Charles entered the game as the Big 12's leading rusher.

McKinney said the attitude is just a reflection of what he sees every day on the practice field.

"We hit every day at practice, and somebody's bound to get hurt at practice, but it's all for a cause on Saturday," he said.

The physical play has been a number of surprising mental plays that have contributed to the success they have had this season. When the down linemen can't get to the passer, they've done a good job of getting their hands up and tipping passes, giving the secondary a chance to make game-changing plays.

Two of the Wildcats' interceptions against Texas were tipped passes.

The secondary unit has been ravaged by injuries this year. Ray Cheatham, Bryan Baldwin and Marcus Watts have all been out at least one game this year, and Joshua Moore has been suspended all season. Still, the secondary is playing well, and Campbell said that's helped out with pressuring the passer.

"We probably should have had more sacks on Saturday because their coverage was so good," Campbell said.

Basically, it all works hand-in-hand for this defense.

The pass rush helps the secondary, but good coverage helps the pass rush. Bottom line: these players want to get to whoever has the ball.

"If Colt McCoy happens to be the one with the ball in his hands, then he's probably gonna be the one that gets hit," McKinney said. "That's just how we look at it."

Riblett, senior in elementary education, portrayed Dorothy Gale in the Columbian Theatre's production of "The Wizard of Oz." The performances, based on the classic 1939 MGM movie musical, were a part of OZtoberFest, a "Wizard of Oz" festival coordinated by the Columbian Theatre and Wamego's OZ Museum.

She performed in the spotlight many times at the Columbian Theatre as a child. Without any previous training or experience, Riblett captured the role of Annie in the musical "Annie" after her first audition for a musical at age 10, Riblett said.

State park entrance closes

By Kristin Hodges
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The west entrance to the River Pond Area of Tuttle Creek State Park will close today and will not reopen until the project's completion sometime between 2009 and 2010, according to a press release from the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers.

The road detour is part of the Tuttle Creek Dam Safety Assurance Program. The detour is needed for safe working conditions and public park use on and around the dam because of large construction equipment and heavy truck traffic from the project, according to the release.

Traffic must enter through the park's east entrance, which is located at the east end of the Tuttle Creek Dam.

According to the release, detour signs will be displayed for drivers to direct them from U.S. Highway 24 and Kansas Highway 13.

Fiji run raises $31,000 for leukemia

By Adrienne DeWeese
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Thirty men put away any Sunflower Showdown rivalries, picked up a football and handed it off for 70 miles during the 34th-annual Phi Gamma Delta Run for the Leukemia and Lymphoma Society on Friday.

The run, which started at the Fiji house in Lawrence and finished at the Fiji house in Manhattan, raised about $31,000 in corporate and personal donations between the K-State and the University of Kansas Fiji chapters, said Scott Niebuhr, K-State Fiji Run leader and senior in marketing. The chapters raised about $6,000 more than they raised in 2006.

The philanthropy started in memory of Rod Morgan, a 1972 K-State graduate and Fiji member who died of leukemia on Nov. 2, 1974. Since its creation in 1975, the two Fiji chapters have contributed more than $580,000 to the Leukemia and Lymphoma Society. The run takes place each year prior to the K-State vs. KU football game, with the run finishing at the home team's Fiji residence.

Starting at 8:30 a.m., Niebuhr said each man ran about 200 yards at a time, handed off the football, got into a car and drove to the next point.

"We just want to improve and get it better and do everything we can in the fight against leukemia," he said.

While K-State and KU have been rivals for more than 100 years, Joey LaFleur, KU Fiji philanthropy chair, said rivalry does not exist among the men.

"There's never been any issues of rivalry because we all know we're coming together for a good cause, and it's set aside," LaFleur said.

The Leukemia and Lymphoma Society is the world's largest voluntary health organization dedicated to funding blood-cancer research, education and patient services, according to its Web site, www.leukemia-lymphoma.org.

In his fourth year of participation with the run, John Kuhlmann, K-State Fiji alumni relations chair, said the Fiji chapters are the largest contributors to the Kansas chapter of the Leukemia and Lymphoma Society.

"I'm really proud of it," he said. "It feels good to get out there and run for someone who has the disease. I figure it's the least I can do."

WAMEGO — Visitors saw "The Wizard of Oz" in a new light during the third-annual OZtoberFest.

The festival, which took place Friday, Saturday and Sunday, featured a visit from original Munchkins from the film, a production of "The Wizard of Oz" at the Columbian Theatre, an exhibit of original dresses worn by Judy Garland, and special guest Joseph Luft, Garland's youngest son.

An exhibit at the Columbian Theatre included Luft's photography, which mostly showed pictures of New York and Chicago, and 13 dresses worn by Garland and now owned by Michael Siewert of Georgia.

Jessica Lane, graduate student in counseling and student development, said learning about Garland's past through her child's eyes was the most interesting part of the presentation.

"The ability to ask questions and learning the history of Judy Garland on a personal side, we get a broader picture of who she was," Lane said.

During the presentation, a dress Garland wore on her TV show, "The Judy Garland Show," was on display, and the audience watched footage of the show. The second clip the audience watched was Garland singing to Luft as a child.

"People our age know her as Dorothy, but our parents and grandparents know her films, TV show and life," said Shawn Lane, Wamego resident.

Siewert's exhibit showed several of Garland's dresses. Two were worn when she worked with Fred Astaire on the film "Easter Parade," and Mickey Rooney on the film "Words and Music." The red dress she wore in the film "Meet Me in St. Louis" also was featured.

THIS WEEK | A look at events that occurred during this week in history

TODAY 1871 : GREAT CHICAGO FIRE BEGINS

Flames sparked in the Chicago barn of Patrick and Catherine O'Leary, igniting a 2-day blaze that killed between 200 and 300 people, destroyed 17,450 buildings, left 100,000 homeless and caused an estimated $200 million (in 1871 dollars; $3 billion in 2007 dollars) in damages.
Legend has it a cow kicked over a lantern in the O'Leary barn and started the fire, but other theories say humans or even a comet might have been responsible for the event that left four square miles of the Windy City, including its business district, in ruins.
Dry weather and an abundance of wooden buildings, streets and sidewalks made Chicago vulnerable to fire.

TUESDAY 1967 : CHE GUEVARA EXECUTED

Socialist revolutionary and guerilla leader Che Guevara was killed by the Bolivian army. He was 39.
The U.S.-military-backed Bolivian forces captured Guevara on Oct. 8 while battling his band of guerillas in Bolivia and assassinated him the following day.
His hands were cut off as proof of death and his body was buried in an unmarked grave.
In 1997, Guevara's remains were found and sent back to Cuba, where they were reburied in a ceremony attended by President Fidel Castro and thousands of Cubans.
Guevara was born to a well-off family in Argentina in 1928.

WEDNESDAY 1985 : ACHILLE LAURO HIJACKING ENDS

The hijacking of the Italian cruise ship Achille Lauro reached a dramatic climax when U.S. Navy F-14 fighters intercepted an Egyptian airliner attempting to fly the Palestinian hijackers to freedom and force the jet to land at a NATO base in Sigonella, Sicily. U.S. and Italian troops surrounded the plane, and the terrorists were taken into Italian custody.

THURSDAY 2002 : CARTER WINS NOBEL PRIZE

Former President Jimmy Carter won the Nobel Peace Prize "for his decades of untiring effort to find peaceful solutions to international conflicts, to advance democracy and human rights, and to promote economic and social development." Carter, a peanut farmer from Georgia, served one term as U.S. president between 1977 and 1981.

One of his key achievements as president was mediating the peace talks between Israel and Egypt in 1978.

FRIDAY 1492 : COLUMBUS REACHES AMERICAS

After sailing across the Atlantic Ocean, Italian explorer Christopher Columbus sighted a Bahamian island, believing he had reached East Asia.

His expedition went ashore the same day, and he claimed the land for Isabella and Ferdinand of Spain, who sponsored his attempt to find a western ocean route to China, India, and the fabled gold and spice islands of Asia.
Columbus was born in Genoa, Italy, in 1451.
Little is known of his early life, but he worked as a seaman and then a maritime entrepreneur.

National fire-prevention week begins with open house Sunday

By Willow Williamson
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Children in red plastic fire-fighter helmets could ride on an old fire-truck, tour an ambulance and practice emergency fire-escape routes, among other things, during the Manhattan Fire Department's open house on Sunday afternoon for the first day of National Fire Prevention Week.

Don Francis, assistant fire chief, said the department has sponsored the open house since about 1987.

"We normally have five or six hundred people who come through every year, and I think we are pretty much on target for that," Francis said.

Throughout the week, Francis said the department will go to local elementary schools to educate students about fire safety and fire prevention.

One of the main goals is to teach both children and their parents to have a fire-escape plan ready, he said.

"I think that's the theme this year — practice your fire-escape drills," Francis said.

Statistics show children often sleep through smoke detectors, so Francis said the department is trying to encourage parents to have fire drills at night to teach their children what to do.

"The most important thing is you practice it," he said.

The department helped children with their escape drills by setting up a small obstacle course. Children started the course lying down with a smoke detector above them. When the alarm went off they had to crawl in a tunnel to simulate staying beneath the smoke, go past a door, which would be too hot to touch, and escape by crawling out a window.

Attendees also could go inside an emergency medical technician ambulance.

Bill Hartloff, paramedic, said children could go into the ambulance and learn about the different equipment and get their heart rate tested for fun.

He said the team was part of the open house because of its close relationship with the fire department, since both teams respond to emergency calls.

Most children seem to think 911 only calls the fire department, he said.

"We try to make sure they know we're 911 also," Hartloff said.

Another highlight of the

During the annual open house, Ayden, 6, and Baylee Boyles, 3, ride the ladder in a fire engine outside the fire station. The truck rides were part of the event held from 12-4 p.m. at the station located on the corner of Kimball and Denison avenues.

open house was the 1947 American La France fire truck. People could take a ride on the old truck, which Francis said was retired from the department sometime in the early 1990s.

The truck was turned into a show truck, Francis said, to be used during events like the open house or parades, by installing more seats and seatbelts, so people could ride in it.

Kathy Crespino, Manhattan resident and K-State alumna, said her children, Jessica, 10, and Joey, 7, ask to go to the open house every year because they like it so much.

Crespino and her family moved to Manhattan from Kansas City about three years ago, and she said she was surprised to see the level of excellence from Manhattan's Fire Department.

"(The Manhattan Fire Department does) a lot of things better," she said. "They do a lot of hands-on activities with the kids."

Kansas the 1st state to regulate use of FDA-unapproved Lipodissolve drugs

By Elise Podhajsky
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Kansas Board of Healing Arts passed a regulation in April restricting the use of phosphatidylcholine, better known as Lipodissolve, making Kansas the first state to regulate it.

In August, the board revised the regulation and increased the drug's restrictions.

However, many doctors, patients and offices that use Lipodissolve and phosphatidylcholine injections are unhappy with the regulation, claiming that when the procedure is performed correctly, there have been no negative side effects.

Lipodissolve is a trademark name for a specific type of phosphatidylcholine injection. Only a few institutions use Lipodissolve, while many offices, companies and practices treat people with similar types of phos-phatidylcholine injections.

The drug, which breaks down fat cells for body contour, has not been approved by the Food and Drug Administration.

Mark Stafford, general counsel to the Board of Healing Arts, described the drug as a detergent-like product.

"When you have a skillet full of grease and fat," he said, "you put a drop of dishwashing liquid in there, and it starts to break down the oil. In a way, the drug does the same thing to fat cells in the body."

Stafford said the board first adopted the temporary regulation for phosphatidylcholine in April — allowing it to be used only for clinical research or compounding, which is the preparation of a medication by mixing raw ingredients to cater to a specific patient.

He said the board was concerned about the drug being readily available without proper authority.

Yet following the initial regulation, the board came to realize the drug was not being compounded by pharmacies, but was being manufactured, Stafford said.

"It was not being created for a specific patient, but was being ordered just like any other drug," he said. "Pharmacies had the drug available for doctors in advance, but they were still calling it compounding."

Mark Brown-Barnett, director of the pharmacy at Lafene Health Center, said though the Lafene pharmacy does not deal with compounding and has never provided phosphatidylcholine, he thinks a pharmacy trying to create a demand for the drug by readily providing it for doctors is an ethical problem.

However, he said he does not have as much of a problem with doctors demanding the drug from pharmacists, because he said doctors write off FDA-unapproved drugs all the time.

Despite the ethical controversy, the board revised its original regulation in August to restrict compounding and allow the drug to be used only for clinical research.

Companies and physicians that offer phosphatidylcholine and Lipodissolve injections do not agree with the regulation.

Fig., an international institute which specializes in Lipodissolve, filed an appeal against the board's regulation, stating the company would lose millions of dollars from having to shut down one of its offices in Overland Park, Kan.

Stafford said the state court halted the compounding regulation from going into effect in its entirety until the appeal is further processed. But he said,

"you still generally can't do it."

Dr. Kenneth Fischer, plastic surgeon for the Manhattan Medical Center, said even though he never has advertised phosphatidylcholine injections, he has performed it on 15 patients who have each been extremely happy with the results.

He said he understands the board's initial reasoning for the restriction, but he does not agree with the restriction in regards to compounding.

"First they came out and said you can't do this in salons," he said, "because there was no doctor doing it, and that's really scary, so I can't blame the board. But it's kind of a knee-jerk reaction."

"Oh, we can't have this, let's ban it. A lot of doctors do stuff that's off the label. You prescribe drugs because of the side effect, not for what they are intended to do."

Fischer also said his patients who have received the injections had to sign a waiver stating they understood the drug was not FDA approved and that the consequences of the drug are unknown, but it is those unknown consequences that the board is worried about.

Stafford said that after injections, the drug is metabolized through the liver and pancreas. Because it has not been FDA approved, the drug has not been through sufficient testing to understand the long-term effects.

"What we don't have is any information on what's going to happen to the liver and pancreas when the drug is metabolized through those organs, which is kind of important information, I think," Stafford said. "There are all kinds of things that could go wrong. We hope it doesn't, but until we know, is it worth the risk? We think it isn't."

3 cheers for democracy

Government tortures innocent people in quest for worldwide justice

Perhaps other presidents have had the courage to dress in drag, but many of them probably didn't have the nerve to do it in front of a camera.

In 1963, he pranced around in a short white skirt, mocking rival Massachusetts high schools at pep rallies. Then, they knew him as head cheerleader at the all-boys school Philips Andover. Today, we know him as our commander in chief.

Though President George W. Bush might have traded his pom-poms for the presidency, he continues to command enthusiasm when it comes to getting people to support his team. In this case, it's the United States versus our biggest rival: the world.

Sometimes even the biggest cartwheels and high-kicks won't get you far.

According to the Associated Press, Senate and House Democrats demanded Thursday to see secret memos that reportedly authorize painful interrogation tactics against terror suspects in recent years.

The New York Times reported Thursday that some of the acts included the use of head slaps, freezing temperatures and simulated drownings, known as waterboarding — all of which occurred shortly after then-Attorney General Alberto Gonzales took over the Justice Department.

Bush jeered back Friday, claiming his administration has not violated anti-torture laws and will do anything to prevent further threats.

Whether or not this administration is actually torturing anyone, one thing is likely: Bush's team has secret plays, and it's hard to imagine them not being a tad rough.

When you mess with the world's biggest cheerleader for democracy, don't expect him to put down his pom-poms just yet. You're right, Mr. President, the government doesn't torture people. It just kills them.

In our quest for freedom, it's hard to bring the human aspect to the table. On Sept. 11, 2001, we lost more than 2,974 Americans in the attack on the Twin Towers. We were challenged for the democratic foundation on which we stand. Many of us will be damned before we budge.

As we stubbornly stand our ground, more than 3,800 Americans have lost their lives in the war in Iraq, according to the Department of Defense. These innocent lives include our soldiers, journalists and leaders.

Even those on the other team have lost: people in Iraq who lost their grandmother after our soldiers were forced to shoot them; families whose homes were destroyed by bombs in countries that had not attacked us; and babies who were left behind to die because their parents were not strong enough to live and care for them.

More than 50,000 Iraqis have died in the war, according to a U.N. report released in January. In proportion to the United States, it is the equivalent to 570,000 Americans being killed nationwide in the last three years, according to the Los Angeles Times.

For a country that never has attacked U.S. soil, Iraq has lost more than us — all at the cost of its citizens, when the government should be to blame.

It might be the government's responsibility to protect American soil. When playing the game of democracy, however, the United States shouldn't take away another team's rights just to establish its own. It's an unfair advantage from a country demanding justice.

Before the President announces the game plan at his next political pep rally, remember: he might be the biggest enthusiast on the team, but no magnitude of rah-rah should overshadow justice of those who are purely innocent.

Democrats fail to stand up to President Bush, keep promises

There is a NASA probe on the surface of Mars right now, and its name is "Opportunity." It has been there since January 2004, but in November 2006, there was another opportunity here on Earth: the opportunity given to Democrats by the American people.

In 2006, Democrats realized they had a chance to take control of one or both houses of Congress. They saw Americans' frustration with stubbornness in the Republican-controlled Congress and the White House, and with an open-ended, unnecessary war.

Democrats campaigned well and gained about 30 seats in the House, and six in the Senate. U.S. citizens were tired of the Republicans and gave Sen. Harry Reid, D-Nev., and Rep. Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., the opportunity to finally stand up to President Bush and change the way Washington was working. But this opportunity has been wasted.

The biggest campaign tool the Democrats had was Bush's disastrous handling of the Iraq war. Leaders like Reid and Pelosi pledged to bring an end to the war and to bring our troops home safely.

But after the new leadership was inaugurated, there were some tough talks, and eventually the now Democratic-controlled Congress has bowed to Bush's demands and continues to fund the war with no withdrawal plan and no requirements for the Iraqi government.

This proves the Democrats are more scared of Bush than they are of U.S. voters. According to United Press International on Oct. 2, only 25 percent of Americans support the new $150 billion war-funding bill Bush asked for and Congress passed. The war continues, as does the list of broken promises made by the Democrats.

If the war wasn't enough, the Democrats also made promises to stand in Bush's way if he were to try and strip us of our civil liberties and constitutional rights. They told us they would protect us from the Patriot Act, and they would stop illegal, warrantless wiretapping, and of course, they have done the opposite.

On Aug. 3, the Senate voted 60-28 to approve legalizing Bush's warrantless eavesdropping powers, according to FinalCall.com. Bush was allowed to spy on anyone, citizen or not, without the consent of a judge. Democrats attacked this power when they were in the minority and then jumped on the bandwagon just months later.

We, the American people, grew tired of neo-cons running our country, so we took the reins of power from the Republicans and handed them to the then-minority party, hoping to get our country on the right track. Reid and Pelosi promised us change and hope, but they have delivered neither. Afraid of being painted as pansies or unpatriotic, they have fed the grapes of expanded power to President Bush while we have watched our security, our liberty and our tax dollars disappear.

But there might be hope. An increase in funding for the expiring State Children Health Insurance Plan passed earlier this year with bipartisan support. But of course, Bush vetoed it. While Democrats lack the votes in the House to override the veto, Reid has said Congress will not back down from its support for the funding, according to the Associated Press on Oct. 4.

This is their chance. If the Democrats can stand up for uninsured families and children, and finally push back when Bush pushes them around, there might still be hope in correcting our course.

If they do not, this will be just another wasted opportunity and another broken promise. If they fail, again, their incompetence will join the Opportunity probe in being out of this world.

Pre-parking garage construction proposals, discussions take years

By Mike Kelly
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State is officially two months into construction on its parking garage, yet the roots of the project run much deeper than the past 60 days.

For decades, ideas have been presented to solve the university's parking problems. However, until the current plan emerged in 2005, a variety of reasons had caused each plan to fall through.

"It's been an issue and something that has been talked about and studied for a long, long time," said David Soldan, professor of electrical and computer engineering, who attended K-State from 1965-69. "I remember as a student it being an issue that was discussed."

Numerous solutions to the problem have been studied, including a permanent shuttle system and building a garage in place of Old Stadium, said Darwin Abbott, director of Parking Services.

"There was a proposal to build one in the Old Stadium, and that didn't work for a number of reasons, not the least of which was a river runs through there," Abbott said.

In past instances, K-State received approval from the Kansas Legislature to plan and build a parking garage. However, Abbott said extenuating circumstances, primarily financial, halted progress on the garage.

"When I got here 10 years ago, there was a $10 million parking garage on our list of things we could do," Abbott said. "We had the approval from the legislature, but it never went any farther than that. We realized $10 million wasn't going to buy much of a garage."

Defining the problem also has been an issue throughout the years. Abbott said smaller changes in the past temporarily alleviated the problem, deferring the need for a garage.

"I think in a lot of cases, we

Christopher Hanewinkel | COLLEGIAN

Construction workers have been working on the parking garage for about two months. The issue of parking on campus is one that has been discussed for decades. Many ideas like a permanent shuttle or a parking garage in place of Old Stadium were discussed before K-State decided on the current project.

were getting ready to do something, and something else would happen," Abbott said. "In the late '80s, we had parking that was all gravel. Once asphalt was put down and lines were drawn, all of a sudden we didn't have a parking problem."

More recently, the possibility of a parking garage encompassed half of a KSU Foundation redevelopment plan. In 2003, the Foundation fostered a plan for a hotel and parking garage to be built south of the K-State Student Union.

The business plan, which cost $50,000, called for a 125-room mid-level hotel whose total cost was about $12 million coupled with a 200-stall parking garage. Rationale for the project included the possibility of a built-in training ground for the K-State hotel and restaurant management majors.

Gary Hellebust, Foundation president, told the Collegian in a September 2003 interview that "students in their junior year would rotate through every part of the hotel," had the project gone through.

However, members of the Manhattan hotelier community fervently opposed the plan, claiming that it constituted unfair competition. Though the Foundation commissioned a study that found a shortage of 200 rooms in the Manhattan area, local business owners opposed the idea.

Colin Noble, past owner of the Ramada Inn, said having the university openly compete for business that ministered to the university's needs was "ill considered" and "disingenuous," according to a November 2003 press release.

Noble said he was "prepared to fight to the death" against the hotel and parking garage, according to a September 2003 Collegian article. However, that would be unnecessary.

In early 2004, Hellebust announced that the Foundation did not go to the state legislature for land purchase to build the hotel and garage. He said more information was needed before a plan could move forward. The proposal stayed just that, and no permanent action was taken.

About 16 months later, plans for a parking garage began again, as K-State conducted another $50,000 study. In fall 2005, Gary Leitnaker, assistant vice president for the division of human resources, presented the new plans to both the Student and Faculty senates.

Student Senate approved the plans resoundingly with a 49-8-0 vote, primarily following the campaign of former student body president Michael Burns. However, the Faculty Senate did not agree. Citing the increased parking fees and a philosophical disinclination toward encouraging more cars on campus, a Faculty Senate straw poll struck down the proposal, 13-31-0.

Despite faculty concerns, preliminary plans went to the Kansas Board of Regents in October 2005. The board approved these plans, and the Council on Parking Operations had forums to gauge university support for the project.

After determining the garage proposal enjoyed public support in April 2006, the council voted unanimously to recommend construction. One month later, K-State made the final decision to proceed.

New Pizza Hut in McCall Road development offers bistro-style menu

By Willow Williamson
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Sleek black tables and Italian-style paintings are just some of the aspects of the new Pizza Hut at 1005 Hostetler Drive.

Mike Simons, general manager, said the decor, televisions and music give the restaurant a new atmosphere.

"(The restaurant is) not so fast paced — run, run, get in and hurry out," Simons said.

This Pizza Hut is changing the diner's experience, he said. "We're focusing on a new, casual dining service," Simons said.

Katie Tyler, server at Pizza Hut and K-State alumna, transferred from the now-closed Pizza Hut on Third Street. She said the restaurant is going for a classier style.

"We try to be more of a nice restaurant ... than a fast-food restaurant," Tyler said.

Nora Gehrke, junior in kinesiology, said she liked the new look of the store. She said it was different than others she has visited.

"It's nicer than a lot of Pizza Huts I've been to," she said.

Along with the atmosphere, this Pizza Hut's menu has changed slightly. It offers new salads, including an Italian Tuscan Salad; new sandwiches, including a Black Forest Ham & Cheese; and new soups.

These items come from the Pizza Hut Bistro's menu, which this store has somewhat included.

"We're just a Pizza Hut ... We put a little bit of the bistro in it," Simons said.

These menu changes come from customers wanting a change, he said.

"The market just calls for it," he said. "(We are) trying to focus more on the customer and what they want."

The new store is located within the new development on McCall Road. It is one of four restaurants opening in the area, including a Wendy's, which is already open, and a Taco Bell and an IHOP, which are being built.

"There's a lot of traffic up and down McCall Road, and that'll help all four restaurants," Simons said.

Simons, who managed at the Third Street store, said most of the employees transferred to the new store.

"Most of them came here, and we added some new ones, of course," he said. "We're still hiring."

Peter Agre, M.D., currently serves as vice chancellor for science and technology at Duke University Medical Center. In 2003, Dr. Agre shared the Nobel Prize in Chemistry for revealing the molecular basis for the movement of water into and out of cells. His 1992 paper in the journal Science, with Johns Hopkins physiologist Bill Guggino, Ph.D., documented the discovery of the first water-channel protein — called an aquaporin — which facilitates the movement of water molecules into and out of cells through the cell membrane.

TURNING POINT

Josh Freeman's third interception

With K-State down 30-24, Freeman led the offense close to mid-field. On fourth down, he rolled right and threw a pass to senior Daniel Gonzalez, but KU cornerback Aqib Talib jumped in front of Gonzalez to intercept the pass and seal the game for Kansas.

QUOTE OF THE GAME

Gary Chandler | On KU's offensive performance: "They're a good team. It kind of shocks you a little bit with their ability to run the ball, but there is nothing we can do about it now."

MAGIC NUMBER

170 | Kansas had 170 rushing yards against a K-State defense that was only giving up 88 yards per game on the ground. The Wildcats didn't have an answer for either sophomore Jake Sharp or senior Brandon McAnderson.

MVP

Jordy Nelson | Nelson showed why he is a big-time receiver by burning KU's Aqib Talib for a 68-yard touchdown. Nelson finished with 10 catches for 137 yards.

Jayhawks deserve credit

The final scoreboard didn't tell the whole story. Sure, it revealed the result of the game, a 30-24 Kansas victory over the Wildcats.

But there was some extra significance to it. The Jayhawks had gone 18 years without winning in Manhattan, and to this point, they had yet to prove themselves this season.

Though they've put together winning seasons in the past, most of them were backed by easy victories against non-conference teams. Those easy wins seemed to be the foundation for this year's team, too.

That was until Saturday, when Kansas walked into Snyder Family Stadium and took down the Wildcats, a team that seemed poised to move up in the Top 25 polls.

"Today, they were clearly the better team," coach Ron Prince said after the game.

It's hard to argue with that, isn't it?

Kansas deserves plenty of credit. Not only did the Jayhawks steal a win in a hostile environment, but they did it convincingly. They didn't win because of a lucky break or a fluke play. They won because they were better.

And now, with a 1-0 start to conference play and a home game against Baylor forthcoming, the Jayhawks should have the attention of every team in the Big 12 North.

They have to be considered legitimate contenders to compete with Missouri. How can they not be? This is a team that, as Prince said in his post-game press conference, plays well in all three phases. They have no weaknesses.

Not only that, but the Jayhawks apparently didn't even bring their best game.

"There are some things that need to be fixed," Kansas coach Mark Mangino said. "We did not play flawless football today by any stretch."

Early on, it did not seem like the Jayhawks belonged on the same field as K-State. They looked slow, they looked imprecise, and they played poorly on both sides of the ball. At the end of the first quarter, K-State out-gained the Jayhawks 143-38 and had a 7-0 lead.

Kansas quarterback Todd Reesing struggled to get anything going offensively. The timing he had with his receivers clearly was thrown off by the pressure applied by K-State's front seven.

Soon enough, though, the Jayhawks made adjustments. They gained confidence with every offensive play call. On defense, they created turnovers. Shortly after halftime, they were clearly in control.

By game's end, they had stolen a hard-fought road victory.

"The kids hung together on the sideline, the coaches stayed calm, we stayed with the game plan, and good things happened," Mangino said.

It will be interesting to see just how far the Jayhawks go.

After their performance Saturday, which moved them to 5-0 overall and a No. 20 ranking, their ceiling is certainly higher than any of us could have expected.

You've got to give them credit for that.

After feeding on all those cupcake opponents in the non-conference schedule, there was a bit of mystery regarding the legitimacy of Kansas' undefeated start.

Not anymore.

Backed by Todd Reesing's 267-yard, three-TD performance, the Jayhawks marched into Manhattan with something to prove and came away with a 30-24 victory over K-State on Saturday at Snyder Family Stadium.

It was the Jayhawks' first win in the Little Apple since 1989. With so many doubts surrounding this year's team — much of it a result of having one of the worst strength of schedules in the nation — the victory caught at least a few people by surprise.

The Jayhawks, of course, saw it coming all along.

"What more can we say?" said wide receiver Dexton Fields, whose 30-yard TD reception with 6:27 left gave Kansas a 27-24 lead. "We were doubted this whole time, but we knew we were gonna give it to them."

It was all high fives and fist pumps on the Kansas sideline as the final seconds ticked away. When they ran off the field, they were greeted by a gathering of Jayhawk fans near the south end zone.

The celebration continued more than 30 minutes later as the team boarded the bus.

"We've got guys that want to win, and we're gonna win," said running back Jake Sharp, who scored the Jayhawks' first TD with a 20-yard rush in the second quarter. "I read in some paper that we were the most overrated undefeated team or something. We don't take that

BREAKDOWN

Wildcats fails to stop KU 'when it counted,' Prince says

By Ryne Witt
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

After the first quarter of play on Saturday, it looked as if K-State's defense was going to have another dominating performance to put on the shelf for the 2007 season.

Sophomore safety Chris Carney intercepted Kansas quarterback Todd Reesing's pass on the first play from scrimmage, and the defense was causing disruption in KU's backfield. The Jayhawks looked uncomfortable, and they went 3-and-out three times during the opening period.

At the end of the first quarter, Kansas mustered only 38 offensive yards and completed just three passes.

Then KU seemed to flip a switch, and the offensive light turned on.

The Jayhawks racked up 159 yards in the second quarter, 115 yards in the third quarter and 125 yards in the final quarter. They finished with a total of 437 yards on 75 plays.

What happened to the defense that was only giving up 276 yards per game?

"I couldn't tell you what changed," Carney said. "We just couldn't stop the run when we needed to, and we couldn't stop the pass in the red zone."

Stopping the run was one of the strong points for the Wildcats' defense coming into the game, with the unit giving up only 88.75 yards per outing. Two Kansas players almost ran for that much as individuals.

Senior fullback Brandon McAnderson ran for 81 yards on 12 carries, and sophomore Jake Sharp ran for 77 yards on 17 carries. The Jayhawks as a team ran for a total of 170 yards on 39 carries.

The Wildcats had chances to make those runs shorter but found themselves missing tackles and letting the Jayhawks continue drives.

"That's an issue we have been battling with for the whole season," junior safety Gary Chandler said. "We've just got to do a better job of wrapping up."

Coach Ron Prince described it as the Jayhawk offense forcing the defense to make arm tackles.

"It is very difficult to arm tackle backs in Division I, especially in space," Prince said.

In the pass defense, the Wildcats had three interceptions and two sacks, but those stats were deceiving, because they gave up three touchdowns and 267 yards to Reesing.

"To this point, Reesing is the best quarterback we have played against," Prince said.

They also gave up the touchdown that put KU up for good.

After K-State took the lead 24-21 with 7:32 remaining, the Jayhawks drove down the field on four pass plays. The drive finished with a 30-yard pass to KU junior Dexton Fields for a touchdown to give Kansas the lead 27-21 with a little more than six minutes left.

"We went down, forced a turnover, had some nice things happening, but ultimately, we couldn't stop them when it counted," Prince said. "I'm disappointed for sure."

Junior Ian Campbell had a sack, five tackles with three for a loss and one pass breakup. He was one of the bright spots for the K-State defense, but the Cimarron, Kan., native took the loss personally.

"I take every game personal," Campbell said. "I put in a lot of work, so do these guys, and you prepare a lot, so every time you take a loss or a win, it is going to be personal."

BRACKETS

Worst of the worst |

This is a bracket page to determine who in rock-'n'-roll history is the worst front man of all time. This is the first of many bracket pages that will run on the Edge page throughout the semester. If you have any comments on today's brackets or competitions you would like to see in the future, send comments to edge@pub.ksu.edu.

PETE WENTZ

AGE: 28
BAND: FALL OUT BOY

As the front man of the punk-rock band Fall Out Boy, Pete Wentz lives up to the potential of a dramatic, awful front man. His political views are constantly made known through his obscene comments at concerts, where the audience could really care less. They did not pay $35 for tickets to listen to Wentz's political views.

In addition, there were reports of Wentz planning to take a chimpanzee to the Kerrang Awards in response to criticism from animal-rights groups for the use of apes in the "Thanks fr th Mmrs" video. Wentz did have a black-and-white monkey at the 2006 MTV Awards for similar reasons.

GWEN STEFANI

Stefani has almost been responsible for the demise of No Doubt not once, but twice. While working on the band's third album, "Tragic Kingdom," Stefani's ugly break-up with fellow band member Tony Kanal nearly resulted in the disbanding of No Doubt. The entire "Tragic Kingdom" album chronicles Stefani's rollercoaster feelings about the relationship — another example of how everything is always about her.

In 2004, Stefani chose to pursue a solo career and selfishly placed No Doubt on an indefinite hiatus. The band claims to be working on a new album, but while Stefani is busy juggling a new baby, a clothing line and solo records, a new No Doubt album seems like an unlikely possibility.

STEFANI VS. WENTZ

While Pete Wentz and Gwen Stefani might wear similar amounts of makeup and jean sizes, Wentz is the truer front "man." His front-man status isn't the result of some chance circumstance like Stefani's, and Wentz didn't spur the near break-up of his band. Wentz is a team player when it comes to Fall Out Boy, and sadly the same cannot be said for Stefani. Her numerous solo projects and selfish disposition toward band members propels her to a stunning victory over Wentz.

GWEN STEFANI

Dee Snider, the lead singer of Twisted Sister, is officially the worst front man in rock history. The primary reason is that Twisted Sister was a hair metal band. Hair metal is, at best, a gimmick genre that was only sustained because there really wasn't any other good music for consumers to listen to. Dee and Twisted Sister took the success of metal, sold out even more metal acts than previously and continued to maintain that the music they created is some of the best American rock music ever.

Not only does Snider not realize what he was part of was an act, Snider speaks about Twisted Sister like it was the only band to come out of the '80s. The claim that Twisted Sister is the "hardest rocking band Of all time," a claim made numerous times by the band and Snider over the years, is also completely false.

DEE SNIDER

In a recent documentary that aired on VH1 about the history of metal, Snider was vocal about his feelings on Led Zeppelin. When asked whether or not he liked the band, which Rolling Stone called the "hardest of all time," Snider responded with a resounding "no." The reason he said he did not like them was because they are "not metal."

"There were times when they would have bluegrass in their songs," Snider said. "That's not metal!" So why is Dee Snider the worst front man of all time? His band was a gimmick, he thinks he rules the rock world, and he said Led Zeppelin was not a metal band. Enough said.

DEE SNIDER

BOYD VS. SNIDER

While Brandon Boyd thinks he is God's gift to women and the stage, he pales in comparison to "The Dee." The mere fact that Dee was willing to frizz his hair and put on enormous amounts of makeup makes Boyd's shirt loss and drinking seem like freshman shenanigans. Also, Snider's insistence that his band is the greatest of all time makes him a bigger jerk than Boyd ever will be.

DEE SNIDER

AGE: 52
BAND: TWISTED SISTER

Twisted Sister was a hair metal band in the '70s that managed to stick around until the late '80s. The band did give us songs like "Come On Feel The Noise," "We're Not Gonna Take It," and "I Wanna Rock," but it also gave us Dee Snider.

While on stage, Snider does his best at singing — which is not bad — but most critics of the band cannot get past the outrageous hair and outfits. Any rocker who wears makeup is not a rock-'n'-roll front man.

BRANDON BOYD

AGE: 31
BAND: INCUBUS

While on stage, Boyd is a big fan of losing his shirt mid-performance. Working it off from song to song, the shirt never seems to be on when the concert is over. Boyd also has a habit of drinking red wine while on stage. There is never an excuse for a rock musician to take off his or her shirt on stage. Never.

While Boyd can write very good lyrics to sing in front of a great band, he fails to be the ideal front man of a band like Incubus. The hard, alternative sound screams for a harder, rougher lead man than the soft, emotional vibe he projects.

lightly."

The Jayhawks played sloppy in the first half, as Reesing threw a pair of interceptions and misfired on several of his early pass attempts.

"When he was struggling, we weren't worried," said full-back Brandon McAnderson. "That was the first time I've really seen him struggle, but he was like, 'I'm alright. We got this.'"

Reesing went 10 of 15 for 150 yards and a pair of TDs in the second half, as K-State's defense couldn't get off the field.

"We couldn't stop the running game when we needed to, and we definitely couldn't stop the passing game in the red zone," said K-State's Chris Carney, who had a pair of interceptions. "We shut them down, and then we kind of let it go."

Leading 21-17 in the fourth quarter, the Jayhawks came out throwing on 1st-and-10 from their own 14-yard line. Reesing threw a pass to Fields out in the flats, but rather than hitting his hands, the ball deflected off his helmet.

The ball hung in the air for a few seconds, just long enough for Carney to intercept the pass. Five plays later, the Wildcats had the lead at 24-21 on senior Deon Murphy's TD catch.

Fields, watching helplessly on the sideline, knew all he needed was a shot at redemption.

"All I said was, 'God, give me another chance to make it up,'" Fields said. "I couldn't let my team down like that."

His chance came on the ensuing possession. On a 3rd-and-1 play from the K-State 30-yard line, he caught the ball in stride across the middle of the field and raced into the end zone.

K-State (3-2, 1-1 Big 12) had two more possessions to try and take the lead, but both drives ended with Josh Freeman interceptions.

"We weren't able to do it," Freeman said.

The Wildcats led by seven points on two separate occasions in the first half. Jordy Nelson found the end zone first with a 68-yard touchdown reception – a leap and grab over Kansas' Aqib Talib – on K-State's second possession of the game.

But the Jayhawks scored late in the first half to tie the score at 14 and increased the lead midway through the third quarter on Dezmon Briscoe's 28-yard touchdown reception.

Kansas is now 5-0 for the first time since 1995.

VOLLEYBALL | NO. 7 TEXAS 3, NO. 17 K-STATE 2 (30-26, 25-30, 30-27, 22-30, 15-9)

Wildcats lose 2nd-straight match

By Jonathan Potter
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State volleyball team faced a challenge last week – they competed against two top-10 opponents in four days.

First it was top-ranked Nebraska and then No. 7 Texas.

After K-State lost 3-0 at Nebraska on Wednesday, the Longhorns defeated the No. 17 Wildcats 3-2 (30-26, 25-30, 30-27, 22-30, 15-9) Saturday night at Ahearn Field House.

Still, K-State coach Suzie Fritz said her team was ready for the test and played well.

"They are really good," Fritz said of the Longhorns. "I thought we competed so hard. I am exceptionally proud of them. If that team shows up to most matches – that K-State team – we'll win most of them."

Coming into the match,

Texas had swept four of its last five opponents and is now 6-1 in the Big 12. The Longhorns only have lost three matches this season, once to Nebraska and twice to No. 3 Penn State.

Though Texas has lost just once in its last nine appearances, coach Jerritt Elliott considered K-State a worthy opponent.

"We knew this was going to be a battle," Elliott said. "To be able to play here and win was huge."

The Wildcats' loss moves them to 5-3 in conference play and 13-5 overall.

Fritz said her squad was struggling to block Texas.

"They're 6-5 across the front row," Fritz said. "We felt there was going to be some match-up concerns, for sure."

K-State's main concern was the Longhorns' 6-foot-4 outside hitter Destinee Hooker. She led her team with 18 kills on .256 hitting. Also tallying double-digit kills for Texas were Juliann Faucette (15), Brandy Magee (13) and Lauren Paolini (11).

Junior outside hitter Nataly Korobkova led the Wildcats' attack, recording 23 kills and 10 digs. Senior libero Angie Lastra was the only other Wildcat to chalk-up 10 or more digs, finishing with 21. Her performance marks her 25th career match with 20 or more digs.

Korobkova also led the Wildcats in aces with three, but perhaps more notable was Stacey Spiegelberg's lone ace. Spiegelberg wrote herself into the K-State record books, tying Kathy Saxton (1989-92) with 120 career aces.

After their bye week, the Wildcats travel Saturday to Iowa State.

FEST | Sons of writer, actress visit

"The Wizard of Oz" was the first film ever to be in color and is said to be a Technicolor Triumph for MGM Studios, Siewert said.

"Today the film would be made from computer animation, and to see the work done for that time is amazing," he said.

Siewert said though "The Wizard of Oz" has ties to Kansas, the festival puts Wamego on the map.

This was Luft's first time at the festival, and he said he loved how many people came to experience "The Wizard of Oz" and learn more about his mother.

"I love being her son," Luft said. "I've gotten to travel and meet really famous people like Frank Sinatra. Growing up, being with her and watching her perform when she sang songs multiple times – she always sang a different version, and it was interesting to see what she would do."

Families also could meet Roger Baum, great-grandson of

L. Frank Baum, author of "The Wonderful Wizard of Oz," and they could meet two original Munchkins, Karl Slover and Ruth Duccini.

Baum said the book is a part of Kansas' heritage, and it brings people together.

"It is wonderful; it keeps us on our feet," Baum said. "Love, heart, wisdom and courage; that's what it is about. That's the appeal. It creates memories, and everyone can learn from it."

It was Slover's third time at the festival. He had the same views about the film as Baum did about the book. He said the film is great not just because of the talent but because of what the film brings to families' living rooms.

"There is no filtered language, nudity – it is pure," he said. "Children can watch it all the way through, and families can enjoy it."

Working on the set, Slover said Garland was the sweetest, most talented girl, especially to the Munchkins.

"She was only 16 and always wanted to talk to the Munchkins," he said.

Slover said the "apple trees" would stare at the Munchkins when they were on set, and the Munchkins did not understand because they did not know there were people inside the trees.

"The apple trees would always make faces at us when we weren't working, and then we finally figured out that there were men inside the trees, because in the film, the trees are throwing apples at the Tinman," Slover said.

The festival is a highlight for the town of Wamego, and this year has been the best, said Ellie Coots, gift shop manager. She said people had to wait more than an hour to meet Slover and Duccini on Saturday, and she said walking from one place to the other was difficult because there were so many people.

"There was around six to seven hundred visitors, and everything was sold out," Coots said. "We hope for years to come that we can have our core guests, new faces and new exhibits."

various other lead roles. She portrayed Becky Thatcher in "Tom Sawyer," the role of Snoopy in "Here's to You, Charlie Brown" and the role of Sarah in "Guys and Dolls."

Riblett's self-esteem immediately increased, and she learned a lot about herself, she said. Her constant rehearsal and performance played a positive, prominent role in her young life and kept her busy in a small town like Wamego.

After three years of non-stop singing, dancing and acting on the Columbian Theatre stage, Riblett said she eventually became burned out with theater. Riblett stopped performing for seven years and had not seriously considered performing again, she said.

"I was really interested in the part once I heard about it, so I auditioned and got the part," Riblett said. "I really enjoy playing Dorothy. I try to make her stronger as a character, and it's easy for me to portray her, because I think we share some of the same characteristics."

acteristics.

"I love being able to bring my own characteristics to the stage, and playing Dorothy lets me do that. It's so much fun."

Riblett's family members said they were ecstatic when they heard that she was performing the role of Dorothy at the Columbian Theater.

"I am very excited about Abby playing Dorothy," said Abby's mother, Betsy Riblett. "It's a parent's dream come true to have your daughter play that role, especially since we're from Kansas. Abby is a bright, bubbly and energetic person, and I think that Dorothy's like that too."

Abby Riblett said she also recently began working at the OZ Museum in Wamego. Working at the museum helped her learn quite a bit about "The Wizard of Oz," which in turn helped her perfect her performance, she said.

"I absolutely love working there," Riblett said. "Some people that come in to the museum are so dedicated to Oz. They come in and want to come in and discuss facts about 'It is so cool, and I've felt much more connected to and knowledgeable about 'Oz,' which has really helped my performance."

Several audience members said Riblett's accurate and talented portrayal of Dorothy impressed them.

"She performed exceedingly well," said Trisha Dameron, K-State Student Union employee. "It takes a special person to really stand out in a performance like this, and (she) played her character very well. She is so cute, and I was very impressed."

Riblett said she will not continue acting after "The Wizard of Oz." She said she is graduating in May and getting married. She plans to be an elementary school teacher.

"This show is my final hoorah before the end of college," Riblett said. "I always told myself I wanted to be Dorothy, so it was a great experience to have before I graduate. I'm ready to be a teacher, get married and have my own life. I am so grateful to have had these experiences – performing was a great part of my growing up."

Teenage woman raped in Ogden

By Willow Williamson
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A 19-year-old woman reportedly was raped in her Ogden, Kan., residence Friday night, according to the Riley County Police Department.

RCPD Lt. Kurt Moldrup said the woman knew her alleged attacker.

The woman told police the suspect, a 20-year-old man, forced her to have sex with him sometime between 9:45 p.m. Saturday and 10 a.m. Sunday.

Moldrup said the woman was not injured.

No further information has been released.

Man airlifted after accident

By Willow Williamson
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A Manhattan man was airlifted to a Wichita hospital after rolling his car on Kimball Avenue early Saturday morning, according to the Riley County Police Department.

Francisco Nunez, 28, of Manhattan, reportedly was driving east in the wrong lane on Kimball, said RCPD Lt. Kurt Moldrup.

Moldrup said Nunez had to swerve south to avoid an oncoming car and hit the curb, causing his 2000 Ford Expedition to roll several times.

Moldrup said Nunez was speeding when the accident occurred, and he said police suspect alcohol also was involved.

Nunez and passenger, Victor Quinoñes, 26, both were wearing seat-belts and were extricated by an emergency response team, Moldrup said.

They both sustained injuries and were transported to Mercy Regional Health Center. Nunez later was airlifted to a Wichita hospital.

Soldiers learn combat life-saving skills in Ft. Riley course

By Katelynn Hasler
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Sergeant Major Carlos Sanchez goes over the proper method of securing an airway through the nose with Sergeant Miller during the medical training course. Soldiers are put into such courses before being deployed into battle.

FORT RILEY — One soldier hurries to wrap a tourniquet — one that will stop deadly blood loss — around the arm of a cloth dummy. Another inserts a plastic tube — one that will deliver life-saving breath — into the airway of a plastic head. Both are working quickly and efficiently, calmly announcing and explaining each task as they go.

These soldiers are students in Fort Riley's combat life-saving course. They are learning skills that will help them save fellow injured soldiers on the battlefield.

"We want soldiers to understand how to do these things now, so that it becomes muscle memory," said Sgt. Baldwin Fisher, class instructor. "That way when they get out there and things start happening, they know what to do automatically."

Before deployment, units at Fort Riley are sent through a series of training sessions to teach them how to respond in any number of situations they might face once they are deployed. The combat life-saving course is just one part of the sessions. Training for each unit is months long and includes lectures and physical activities.

Many sessions are medically related, but not all. Soldiers also undergo cultural immersion training, where they are exposed to different aspects of the culture they will enter once they are deployed. There are also a number of simulation exercises.

For simulation exercises, an area is set up to imitate

Man mugged Sunday in Aggieville

By Willow Williamson
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A man allegedly was attacked by two unknown men early Sunday morning, according to the Riley County Police Department.

Ryan Adams, 22, of Bucyrus, Kan., told police he saw two men harassing some women in Aggieville. Police said Adams told the men to leave the women alone, and the two men left. Later, the two men allegedly beat up Adams while he was walking north on Manhattan Avenue, said RCPD Lt. Kurt Moldrup.

Police said the two suspects, both white men 20 to 25 years old, were unknown to Adams. One suspect was 5 feet 7 inches tall with a long shaggy beard and waist-length brown hair, wearing blue jeans, a black T-shirt and a black hat. The second suspect was between 6 feet, and 6 feet 2 inches tall, wearing all black clothing.

Adams was transported to Mercy Regional Health Center with major bruising and swelling to his forehead and around his ears and a possible broken nose, Moldrup said.

Drive hopes to end blood shortage

By Adrienne DeWeese
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State students and faculty members can help the American Red Cross in its summer blood-donation shortage during this week's blood drive.

Factors like busy farmers, a shrinking donor pool, medical advances and an aging population have contributed to a low blood supply, said Kristi Ingalls, donor recruitment representative for the Central Plains American Red Cross.

"Usually we see shortages during summer and winter during the holidays," Ingalls said. "However, this year, we have been seeing that need continue throughout the year."

K-State has a goal of 680 pints of blood for the four-day, two-location blood drive, which starts today. Red Cross has contracts with more than 100 hospitals in Kansas and northern Oklahoma, and their needs determine the blood-drive goals, Ingalls said. All blood types are needed, she said.

While the Red Cross has met its past donation goals, when goals are not met, patients in need of blood are not supplied with necessary blood, Ingalls said.

"It's really a life-saving operation that we're doing," she said. "The students really are saving lives."

Men cited for selling tickets without permit

By Willow Williamson
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Police cited two men for illegally selling tickets to the K-State vs. University of Kansas football game Saturday morning, according to the Riley County Police Department.

RCPD Lt. Kurt Moldrup said police saw two men selling tickets before the game on the corner of Himes Road and College Avenue.

"Officers saw a business exchange take place," Moldrup said.

The two men, John Paul Gordan, 38, of Kansas City, Mo., and Jeffery Winn, 40, of Independence, Mo., were given citations for soliciting a business without a permit, he said.

One reason Moldrup said police suspected the men were selling tickets as a business was because they had stadium seating charts for the tickets.

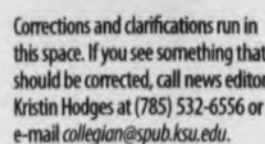

Police officers seized four tickets and $1,719 the men had in their possession.

1985 Collegian writer reviews 1st performance in Nichols Hall since its burning

The opening of the play, "Stop Kiss" debuts Thursday in Nichols Hall. Take a look at the very first performance in Nichols when the building was turned into a performance facility from a gymnasium after the fire of 1968. The following is a review of that first performance, "The Buck Stops Here," from the Nov. 11, 1985, Collegian.

EQUITY ACTOR RECREATES PRESIDENT TRUMAN'S LIFE

By Lisa Boothe
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

In Nichols Theatre's premiere performance Friday night, what could have been more apropos than an original musical by a K-State speech professor about a Midwest farmer who grew up to be the 33rd president?

Based on the life of President Harry S. Truman, "The Buck Stops Here," was a sell-out show.

The musical is a collaboration between Norman Fedder, professor of speech, and Richard Lippmann of St. Louis. Both men had researched Truman's life independently before combining their efforts.

"Buck" premiered in New York by the AMAS Repertory Theater and has been performed at the Lyceum Theatre in Arrow Rock, Mo., and the Smithsonian Institute. Fedder and Lippmann hope the musical will someday run annually in Truman's hometown of Independence, Mo.

From Scene 1 to Scene 30, Truman's personal and political relationships are recreated with just the right balance of sentimentality and restraint. It was a real eye-opener for those too young to remember Truman. And at a time when the name Truman has become a too-common buzz word for overzealous button pushing, it is a tribute to his integrity.

Throughout his life, Truman worked hard to be regarded by others as his own man. He fought for principle, whatever the consequences.

But Truman is not characterized as a saint. It is no accident he is depicted as somewhat of a good-natured nitwit at first - long on book-brains but short on social senses. This makes it easier to rally for his causes later.

And like most people, Truman had both faults and virtues. Fedder's book presumably focuses on his honesty. A book to be released in December by Richard Lawrence Miller will focus on the supposed crooked deals of Truman's early days. Such is public opinion. It is a difficult task to span 60 years, focus on Truman's relationships to four women, set this to song and dance, use only one set with no curtain and no lengthy transitions, and still come up with a smooth and wholly believable production. But it was done.

The greatest thrill of the evening came from watching equity actor Harris Shore capture the appearance, mannerisms and convictions of Truman, a so-called "lick-the-pan yokel." Shore originated the role, and although he has a slew of stage and television appearances to his credit, he seemed to interact well with the amateur cast.

However, don't let "amateur" throw you. Aside from a few opening-night voice jitters, the cast was clear, well trained and expansive. Although it was evident the actors were better singers than dancers, the choreography was spirited.

Particularly fun was "The Haberdashery Blues," about Truman's clothing-business failure, and "That Boy's Not Good Enough For You," hilariously sung by Madge, Truman's mother-in-law.

"Will You Be My Best Friend?" a duo with Harry and his wife Bess, tugged at the heart, whether sung by the childhood sweethearts (Justin McCarthy and Ashleigh de la Torre) or the aging sweethearts (Shore and Connie Ramos.)

As Truman's mother, Martha, Terri Myers performed with her usual ability to depict the elderly, and as Madge, Kathleen Pfister has one of the stronger voices and gets some of the best laughs. (It is a shame she had on so much makeup. In the intimate theater her wrinkles looked more like whiskers and detracted from her otherwise ideal performance.)

Perhaps the most impressive aspect of the production was the versatile set and use of stage space. Even the stairways were used, and a platform built near the lighting booth served for Truman's whistle-stop speeches.

And then there's the wonderful three-piece band ... and the great costumes ... and well, see for yourself. You'll be sold out too.

TO THE POINT

Blood donations necessary

Students and faculty members do not need a medical degree to save lives.

One pint of blood, 10 minutes and a 110-pound weight requirement is all it takes to make a contribution that will save three lives.

This semester, the American Red Cross needs students' and faculty members' donations more than ever. While the summer and winter seasons usually have higher demands for blood donations, the Red Cross still is experiencing shortages from this summer.

A common reason that students do not want to donate blood is the fear of needles or passing out from the pain and suffering during a 10-minute donation with health officials surrounding them.

So you're afraid of needles, huh? Well, imagine this: You recline in a bed and have a needle in your forearm for 10 minutes while your best friend or significant other keeps you company. You receive a free T-shirt, cookies and juice after your one-pint donation — and perhaps you also can receive a "sick leave" from your classes for the day.

Now imagine someone whose life depends on a blood donation. It takes that person at least an hour to receive the blood to stay alive, and the process is much more painful. There are no free goodies for them after receiving the transplant, and it is not a 10-minute appointment with surrounding friendly faces. Still scared?

It is not rocket science or brain surgery. Go to the K-State Student Union Ballroom or Putnam Hall this week, lie back for 10 minutes and give to those whose lives depend upon your blood.

TO THE POINT is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

President inconsistent, illogical on policies

President Bush's contradictions have been plentiful over the course of his presidency, but nothing comes close to the issue with his desire for more government surveillance of U.S. citizens, while not allowing increased government power to help them.

SCOTT GIRARD

President Bush vetoed a bill expanding health coverage to children because it would socialize the health-care system, but he has no problem scouring through their health-care records as part of his National Security Agency's surveillance program.

On one hand, Bush wants to take the government out of health care, and on the other, he gives the government ultimate power to spy on basically anyone without a warrant.

It has been debated whether the NSA surveillance program infringes on constitutional rights for several years now, but nothing has been changed. According to an Oct. 7 Washington Post article, the House Democrats plan to introduce a plan to restrict some of the NSA's spying to communications companies while keeping them out of places like hospitals and advocacy groups.

This would be a move toward less unwarranted spying, but if history shows us anything, Bush will veto the bill if it even makes it through Congress.

The fact is the NSA surveillance program is a gross invasion of our privacy. Not even the U.S. attorney general was briefed on some of the happenings of the surveillance program, according to an

Oct. 3 Washington Post article.

Jack L. Goldsmith, head of the Justice Department's Office of Legal Counsel during the first few years of the NSA surveillance program, told the Senate Judiciary Committee he often "could not find a legal basis for some aspects of the program."

So Bush gives illegal power to the government to spy on people in the United States but doesn't want the government controlling our health care. Sounds like a lot of power being given to the government. Maybe he thinks they will be too busy spying on citizens to be bothered with taking care of them.

I don't actually think this, but it would make more sense than Bush's actions on the separate issues. After vetoing the State Children's Health Insurance Policy bill, which would increase federal funding to state children's health programs through an increase on cigarette and cigar taxes, Bush says he wants to compromise with Congress on the issue. This would be a good move considering he had the position of supporting the tobacco industry more than children's health care for a few days.

Bush said he was willing to increase funding for SCHIP but did not want to socialize the system, according to an Oct. 7 Washington Post article.

"Government-run health care would deprive Americans of the choice and competition that comes from the private market," Bush argued. "It would cause huge increases in government spending."

But what the president did not take into account is most people on SCHIP get coverage through private insurance companies contracted to the states, a point highlighted by House Majority Leader and Rep. Steny Hoyer, D-Md.

Hoyer said in an article in the Post, "As Senator Pat Roberts, a strong Republican from Kansas, recently said: 'I am not for excessive spending and strongly oppose the federalization of health care. And if the administration's concerns with this bill were accurate, I would support a veto.' But Sen. Roberts added: 'Bluntly put, they are not.'"

It's confusing — Bush loves government power, then he hates it. It's completely irrational and downright scary to think the leader of our country has no clue what he's doing at times.

Luckily, we have less than a year and a half left of possibly the longest lame-duck presidency in U.S. history.

Liberals use fabricated stories to attack conservatives

MoveOn.org's notorious advertisement against Gen. Petraeus has caused liberals to exacerbate their reliance on smear campaigns to distract people from their unpatriotic stance.

BRIGITTE BRECHEISEN

On Sept. 26, Rush Limbaugh used the term "phony soldiers" in reference to fake soldiers like Jesse MacBeth, who fabricated war stories in an effort to increase anti-war sentiment and attack President Bush and the War on Terror.

According to the Seattle Times on June 8, "(MacBeth) claimed to have killed more than 200 people, many at close range, some as they prayed in a mosque. He spoke at an anti-war rally in Tacoma and appeared in a 20-minute anti-war video."

There is just one minor problem with his claim — none of it was true. MacBeth never even made it through basic training, let alone set foot in Iraq. MacBeth is a phony soldier, but because liberals wanted the stories to be true, they neglected to verify his statements.

The degree to which his comments were misconstrued can be seen by the response from elected Democratic officials in Congress, who can't seem to find anything better to do with their time than to peddle propaganda.

Senate majority leader, Sen. Harry Reid, D-Nev., took time on the Senate floor to address Limbaugh's remark by daring Republicans to sign a letter to send to Limbaugh's parent company, Clear Channel, encouraging them to make him repudiate his comment.

"Just as patriotism is the exclusive realm of neither party, taking a stand against those who spew hate and impugn the integrity of our troops is a job that belongs to all of us," Reid said in his statement on Oct. 1, according to the official Senate Democrat Web site.

It's interesting Reid will only stand up for our troops when he believes a conservative is doing the attacking. On Sept. 20, when the MoveOn.org resolution passed with the exclusive purpose of providing support and condemning attacks against Petraeus and all members of the U.S. Armed Forces, Reid was one of the 25 members who voted against the resolution. Consistency evidently is not one of Reid's fortes.

The 41 Democrats who signed the letter denouncing Limbaugh represent merely the tip of this liberal tirade.

VoteVets.org, an organization of liberal veterans who are against the war in Iraq and Afghanistan, has wasted money on a television advertisement criticizing Limbaugh's alleged remark. Limbaugh compared the tactics used by the organization to a suicide bomber.

"This is such a blatant use of a valiant combat veteran, lying to him about what I said and then strapping those lies to his belt, sending him out via the media and a TV ad to walk into as many people as he can walk into," said Limbaugh on Oct. 2.

Furthermore, the grounds on which they attacked Limbaugh's name were unjustified. On Oct. 4, the vice president of VoteVets.org, Brandon Friedman, appeared on the Rusty Humphries Show admitting the misleading advertisement was made against Limbaugh because he is a threat to their policy, not for the "phony soldiers" comment as the ad suggested.

"The problem I have with Rush Limbaugh is that he enables policy makers who have gotten our country into a lot of trouble ... I mean, this guy has a voice, and he affects people," Friedman said.

VoteVets.org's response to opposition is typical of liberals. When in doubt, point fingers, lie, throw in personal attacks, and then deny everything.

Liberals become more supportive of our troops and "patriotic" when they are assaulting conservatives. Claiming to have pacifist ideals, their infinite attacks on Limbaugh, conservatives and President Bush prove to be quite hypocritical.

least 110 pounds, have general good health and be at least 17 years old, or 16 years old in Kansas with a completed parental consent form.

Prior to donating, people are encouraged to double their water and juice intake and avoid drinking caffeine, Ingalls said. She also said donors should eat an iron-rich meal beforehand.

"It's going to help their overall donation," she said. "They're going to donate much smoother."

Donors are not required to sign a waiver prior to donating, Ingalls said. Prior to the procedure, donors' iron count is tested with a finger prick and their temperatures and blood pressures are measured.

The blood-donation process takes 5-10 minutes depending on how hydrated the donor is, Ingalls said. Donors will receive free juice, cookies and a "Bleed Purple" T-shirt after the donation.

One donor can save three lives with a one pint of blood donation, and every two seconds, someone in the United States needs a blood transfusion, Ingalls said.

The average human body contains between 10-12 pints of blood, and donors must wait at least 56 days wait in between blood donations, Ingalls said.

"One pint might sound like a lot, but when they think about how much they have, it's not that bad," she said.

Donors no longer have to wait one year after getting a tattoo or piercing, Ingalls said. Some overseas travel experiences might make potential donors ineligible because of where they traveled and how long they stayed in certain locations, she said.

If students or faculty members are unsure of their eligibility to donate, Ingalls said they should call (800) GIVE-LIFE.

For students who might be scared to donate blood, Ingalls said she encourages them to bring a friend along during the procedure.

"The K-State drive is always a fun, upbeat drive," she said. "It's definitely a great time for people to give for the first time."

About 20 percent of Central Plains region donors are high-school and college students, said Norma Dixon, American Red Cross communications manager for Students who are nervous about donating blood should consider the amount of time and pain that those who receive blood experience, Dixon said. While it takes about 10 minutes to donate one pint of blood, she said it takes at least an hour for recipients to intake the same amount.

certain circumstances that soldiers might encounter. This way, soldiers learn how to act under pressure in instances like insurgent fighting or where they might be required to enter a building with force.

Soldiers also learn how to evaluate injuries so they can perform the correct procedures to treat common injuries. They learn basic medical techniques that could keep another soldier alive until additional help is available. They also learn how to reach medics in other areas and update them on a soldier's injuries before they arrive.

"We go through all of this training so that it gets stuck in your head," said Sgt. Maj. Carlos Sanchez, student in the course. "Then, when you're out there, you know what to do and you get it done."

The lesson on Sept. 20 included instructions on how to properly apply emergency-trauma bandages to wounds and how to insert an artificial airway. Bleeding is the No. 1 killer of soldiers in the field, Staff Sgt. Jerome Truss said. Applying tourniquets and trauma bandages can help stop bleeding until a soldier can reach a medical unit or a hospital.

There is not always a medic with every unit in the field, Truss said, so every soldier should be able to respond calmly in an emergency situation until medics reach the area.

"We just want every soldier to understand how important all the medical aspects of this job are," he said. "This stuff gives them the chance to get the realism of actually getting their hands on someone."

However, Truss also noted that while this training has saved many lives, it doesn't make the potential of life-threatening injuries any less frightening.

"It kind of gives you a little bit of insurance," he said. "But still, you don't want that to be you laying on the ground."

This training is not just for the soldier receiving it, Fisher said, but for every person who might be depending on them in the field.

"We try to impart upon them that this is not about you," he said.

"This is about the person to the left and right, to the front and back of you. Like we say, nobody's in a foxhole alone."

Leave scandal in the past

Marion Jones is an Olympic hero, or at least she was until she admitted to using steroids last week.

It's not like we couldn't see this coming either. She was married to two separate track-and-field athletes who were caught using, and her former coach was banned from the sport.

Then in summer 2006, Jones found herself in an investigation into a check-counterfeiting operation.

It could have been she was just hanging around with the wrong people, but last week she cleared all doubt.

Jones might have her three gold medals and two bronzes from the 2000 Sydney game stripped by the International Olympic Committee because she pled guilty to lying to federal investigators in the Bay Area Laboratory Co-operative case.

Now she is just another retired athlete whose career has been tainted with steroid controversy.

Call her the Barry Bonds of track and field, and put an asterisk next to her records, her medals and her entire career.

Rumors swirled around her for years after the Olympic wins as her former husbands and coach were nabbed for various steroid related incidents, and then the cherry on top of bad PR came when she was connected to BALCO's very own Victor Conte.

Conte himself said he gave Jones several different drugs during and after the Sydney games, yet Jones wasn't ready to admit the truth back then.

Instead, her decision to wait has not only made her out to be a blatant cheater and liar, but it has affected the reputation of the U.S. Olympic team.

Couldn't have been better timing either, considering the 2008 games in China are just around the corner.

Why would Jones do this to a country she represented and earned gold for?

Is it really possible Jones could not have pulled a gold without taking steroids?

Unfortunately we will never know, and we are only left to wonder what other recent Olympic heroes might have taken steroids to assist a medal-winning performance.

Maybe it was overwhelming pressure for Jones from the rumors swirling around her that made her admit her wrongdoings. Maybe Jones just wanted to clear her conscious.

Yet it doesn't seem like a fresh start is ahead for Jones as her image has been tarnished.

I would like to think Jones didn't understand the drugs at first, and maybe she just got used to them. But even her ex-husband C.J. Hunter, another troubled Olympic athlete, told investigators he watched Jones inject herself.

Again, I ask why? Why, Marion Jones?

We already live in a nation surrounded by questions of steroids in men's sports. Why bring the steroid questions to the seemingly innocent women's sports?

Imagine Mia Hamm approaching a podium tomorrow afternoon and admitting she took steroids during the last half of her career, or Venus Williams telling the press she was being forced to hang up her racket because she has been using steroids.

The best thing we can do now is leave Jones in the past. Try to forget about the accomplishments that have been wiped out and hope the 2008 Olympic games will breathe new life into the U.S. Olympic reputation.

And maybe we will get a few new Olympic heroes too.

Sophomore quarterback Josh Freeman stands over center Jordan Bedore during K-State's 34-14 victory against San Jose State. Bedore was injured during K-State's 30-24 loss to Kansas Saturday and Coach Ron Prince said he would not play this Saturday against Colorado.

Bedore out for at least 1 game; Viers to replace him

Junior center Jordan Bedore will be sidelined for Saturday's game against Colorado, and most likely more of the season, said coach Ron Prince.

"He's out for the game," he said. "I don't want to use the term indefinitely, but he's going to be out at least one game. He's not even questionable. He's not going to be playing this week."

Replacing Bedore at center will be sophomore Trevor Viers. Prince said Viers has taken some snaps this season and is prepared to take on the role.

"I think he's got good movement," he said. "He's a very athletic player. Like Jordan, he's a very defensive player. He has a good sense of it and good mobility; I'm real pleased with that."

"We can all imagine he was pretty excited to be in there in the game. He wasn't perfect but I thought he handled himself and settled down pretty well. We'll go on."

Bedore, who had 10 starts at K-State, originally was a defensive tackle before the coaches switched him to an offensive lineman. The loss of Bedore affects the rest of the offensive backfield, as well. Senior wide receiver Jordy Nelson said he hopes the loss won't be too detrimental.

"Jordan was a key guy," Nelson said. "He makes a lot of calls up there. We've got guys who will step up. A lot of guys have gotten some reps, so we've got some guys who will step up and be ready to perform."

COLORADO MIRRORS K-STATE

Prince said Colorado's statistics are very similar to K-State's. Colorado is ranked No. 4 in the Big 12 Conference in scoring offense with an average of 35 points per game, while K-State is ranked No. 5 with an average of 32.5 points. One section where K-State has a significant advantage is in kickoff returns. K-State is No. 1 in the conference with an average of 33 yards per return and one touchdown. Colorado only is averaging 23 yards per carry and has no touchdowns on the season.

"I think this is not surprising for any of us that the coach has his team well prepared," Prince said. "Statistically, this match-up is a dead heat. I think you can look across the board and see the comparison whether it's runners or passers."

Defensively, the Buffaloes only are allowing an average of 347.5 yards defensively during conference play, which is No. 3 in the conference. K-State is No. 7 in the league in total defense, allowing an average of 383.5 yards during their two conference games.

"They've got some guys defensively who really are terrific, and they've experienced their first road win at Baylor last week," Prince said. "We'll need to demonstrate that we can and will play well again."

"With them beating Oklahoma, they opened a lot of people's eyes," Nelson said. "They're going to be tough. They play a hard-nosed defense."
